TO

THE KING.

SIRE,

I PRESUME to lay before Your Majesty, a second time, the Dictionary of Dr. Johnson; in which, a few years since, I inserted additions that sometimes, it is hoped, discover hidden treasures of our language, and sometimes add celebrity to our propagators of knowledge. By an increase of such additions, by some corrections and new remarks, this reimpression of the work may perhaps be less unworthy Your Majesty's notice. The critical improvement of our lexicography, so as to fix the standard and preserve the purity of the English language, must be the deliberate employment of many; and is indeed a design which the munificent patronage of Your Majesty has originated, in the institution and endowment of the Royal Society of Literature. Gratitude and the honour of the country will give strength and activity to this design; and, when accomplished, it will add to the glories of Your Majesty's reign. To the benignity also of Your Majesty, in encouraging attempts to illustrate, though in a small degree, the literature of England, I am especially and deeply indebted; and, with the most grateful sense of Your Majesty's goodness for the gracious permission thus to express myself,

I am,

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY,

YOUR MAJESTY'S humble and dutiful

Subject and Chaplain,

February 12. 1827. HENRY JOHN TODD.

The Dictionary of Dr. Johnson, with my additions, having been acceptable to the publick, a reimpression of it has been required. I have, in consequence, been asked to render any assistance to the reimpression which might be in my power. What I have been able to do has been done with cheerfulness, in gratitude for the reception of my former extensive labour. Removed by my present residence from the easy reach of that abundance of books, and conversation of men of letters, which then aided my inquiries, I yet have offered (though in number together not more, perhaps, than between two and three thousand) some emendations and some new words. These have been the fruits of leisure in a retired situation; and for these, with the exception of a few remarks from one learned friend, I have been indebted almost wholly to books in my own collection.

Additions indeed have been suggested, in separate forms, to my first edition of this Dictionary by other gentlemen. Of such labours I am quite sure that I could have no right to avail myself further, than by a correction of a very few pardonable errors; and with respect to opinions in which they may have been pleased to differ from me, I do not think myself required to answer them. May these learned persons be more useful than I can be. Still they will find that much is yet to be done. "*Daily both new words," as an ancient lexicographer well observes, "are invented, and books still found that make a new supply of old." Our many excellent writers, during the reigns of Elizabeth and James the First, will yet abundantly exemplify the latter part of this remark. And to the selection of examples, as well as to etymology, and to definition, and to orthography, and to accentuation, the industry and judgement of many yet remain to be directed, divided as they ought to be into distinct studies, ere we can hope to see a beautiful whole, a standard of pure and exact phraseology. Our provincialisms too solicit especial notice; as I have found by a residence of six years in the north of England, which has occasioned the introduction into the following pages of more northern phrases than are in the former edition; in the description of which I am generally confirmed by the entertaining and useful Glossaries of the Craven Dialect and of Mr. Brockett, published within the last three years; and to them I always refer with pleasure. To the very curious Glossary also of Cheshire Words, by my learned friend Roger Wilbraham, Esq. I have been much indebted. The recent Collection of Suffolk Words, by Major Moor, has likewise occasionally strengthened an observation. The same may be said of West Country Words, published in 1825 by Mr. Jennings; to whose candour, in his remark upon the first edition of this Dictionary (in which he suggests improvement and addition that must, however, be the work of many, I repeat, and not of an individual) I am also obliged; for he says, "that although the work will still admit of considerable addition and improvement, it contains, in his judgement, the greatest mass of information on the subject of our own language at present extant."

THE FIRST EDITION OF THIS DICTIONARY.

THE Dictionary of Dr. Johnson has been rightly pronounced a wonderful achievement of genius and labour. Yet Dr. Johnson admitted, that, in forming it, he had not satisfied his own expectations; and, after a revision of it, he replied to a * friend, who had sent him additions too late to be inserted, that if many readers had been as judicious, as diligent, and as communicative, the Dictionary would have been better. He probably, therefore, would not have scorned an augmentation or correction, though offered by one of less attainments than his friend, if offered with due respect.

This consideration supports, in some degree, the mind of the present editor. For, though he feels all the diffidence which most men would feel in occasionally questioning the authority of Dr. Johnson, he is induced to hope, that the warmest admirers of that incomparable man will not disparage the industry which he himself might perhaps have countenanced.

The fruits, such as they are, of the present editor's employment, will be found in an abundant supply of words which have hitherto been omitted; in a rectification of many which etymology, in particular, requires; and in exemplifying several which are without illustration. These words are often the property of authors, the "† very dust of whose writings is gold;" of Pearson, and of Barrow, whose names might very frequently have graced the pages of a national Dictionary; of Bacon and Ralegh, of Jeremy Taylor, of Milton, and Hammond, and Hall, and many others, whose words indeed have largely, but of which the stock is not exhausted, conveyed, in the example, "‡ some elegance of language, or some precept of prudence or piety." These words commend to notice many writers also, who have been unjustly neglected or slightly examined; men who have taught with energy the lessons of human life, and who have explored with accuracy

* The Reverend Mr. Bagshaw, of Bromley College. This answer is in Boswell's Life of Johnson. Additions and corrections, which had been made by this gentleman, have been entrusted to the present editor; of which, as well as of other communications made to him with great liberality and without solicitation, he will, in the Introduction to this work, give an explicit account.

the source of " *English undefiled." The poet, as well as the philosopher, of elder times, will here sanction some expressions, which, from their sound or significance, deserve to be rescued from oblivion. Indeed, without recourse to such assistance, much valuable ore must still be buried in the mine; the structure of words must sometimes remain undiscovered; and the coinage of many forcible terms be still unguardedly † imputed to the moderns.

It is the opinion of ‡Dryden, that the English language arrived to its highest perfection in Beaumont and Fletcher; and that " the words, which have since been taken in, are rather superfluous than ornamental." Few writers have afforded, to the present editor, so many passages of illustration as these dramatists. But it will be found, that our language has certainly derived new graces from many succeeding authors.

" § Words are the people's; yet there is a choice of them to be made." For this reason, the present editor has declined to admit many into the Dictionary; especially what are merely licences of old comedy, and what was the fantastical cant during the great rebellion. Nor has he made an indiscriminate collection of our archaisms. With words from such sources, his pages might have been increased an hundred-fold. But he has not neglected the notice of some expressions, even in authors of little fame, which exhibit what in better writers might be sought in vain, and by which an interesting custom, or a valuable provincial phrase, is sometimes illustrated.

As he thus differs in opinion from those, who cannot allow the omission of any word in the language; so he has not been disposed to follow the advice of others, who would expunge innumerable words which Dr. Johnson has admitted. He has proposed to expunge none; except in a few instances, where no such word, it will be found, in reality exists.

In disturbing the etymology, and very rarely the definition, or in adding to either, his meaning has been to accommodate the reader, without violating the order of the original work; and therefore he has not placed the emendation at a distance from its object, or continued the mistake which it has been his endeavour to rectify. Words thus altered, whether in a great or small degree, will be known by the typographical mark which follows them; and to others, which have hitherto wanted even a single instance of illustration; as well as to some which present an example from a ‖ prose-writer as well as a poet, or which are confirmed by a proof of higher authority than what is given; the same distinction is affixed. To the words newly produced another mark is subjoined. Among these, adverbs in ly, substantives in ness, and verbal nouns in ing, have been introduced without imitating the parsimony with which they have hitherto been exhibited. Nor will appellatives, derived from proper names, be thought intruders; since they have sometimes acquired a meaning so unconnected with their origin, as to demand explanation; and appellatives of a more general nature are agreeable to the regulation of Dr. Johnson himself, who admits a Pagan, though he has rejected a Quaker.

† Burnet objected against Milton, that he had coined many new and rough words; which is so far from being the case, that, if the remark of the old commentator on Spenser may be applied, " the words are not only English, but also used of most excellent authors and most famous poets." Addison also has charged Milton with the coinage of what had long been current.

Of some mistaken references, or imperfect citations, which Dr. Johnson has given, the rectification is without specifick notice; and of such improvements the number, no doubt, might have been much enlarged. But to note minutely all his extracts, would be perhaps a difficulty almost as insurmountable as to correct every mistake. The editions of his Dictionary have been compared; and there are many curious variations, especially from the first. That of his last revision, "*in which he expunged some superfluities and corrected some mistakes, scattering here and there a remark," has been principally regarded; but not without attention to that, which has given a few posthumous additions.

That the value of the citations may be duly appreciated, the present editor intends to offer some notices of the authors cited; which will also chronologically, as well as critically, illustrate the history of our language. And that history of the language which has been given by Dr. Johnson will be augmented with many curious and some hitherto inedited materials.

And now, admitting that Dr. Johnson's Dictionary is not without defect, let it be considered that a work of this kind must necessarily be defective; that in dictionaries, more than in other books, faults will be committed; because, as the great lexicographer has said, he who makes them must often write of what he does not understand. With him, however, rests the entire merit of a Plan, which other labourers in lexicography must regard with admiration and gratitude, however unable individually to complete it.

Thus the aim at universality which Dr. Ash, since the publication of Johnson's Dictionary, has shown in his extensive and useful Vocabulary, has however failed in some particulars; and yet wants many sterling words. Nor has the Supplement of Mr. Mason to the great work of Johnson been received with much regard. For he professes, that he has little knowledge of those languages, without which etymological criticism cannot be employed. He has drawn from obscurity many colloquial licences indeed, but comparatively few expressions of dignity. Where he has been serviceable, it has been a pleasure to incorporate his labours. He had doubtless some talents for research; but he has lowered them by perpetually insulting the memory of Johnson, whom he brands with "muddiness of intellect." Not such have been the exertions of the Reverend Mr. Boucher; of which a specimen has been given to the publick in the first letter of the alphabet, and which abundantly, as well as most learnedly, shows how much remains to be done, in order to have a perfect view of the English Language.

The proprietors of this work have, with unsolicited kindness, procured, for the present editor's inspection, the papers of the late Mr. Horne Tooke, and his copy of Johnson's Dictionary, with some marginal remarks; the late Mr. Henshall's interleaved but slightly noted copy of the same; and the late Mr. Eyre's copy, with additional references in the margin. But these have yielded no great harvest of intelligence. What has been gained, will be more fully detailed, with other obligations to his friends, from whom he must not here omit to mention that he has received some remarks of the late Mr. Malone, in the general Introduction to this work.

After all, what the present editor has done, he considers but as dust in the balance, when weighed against the work of Dr. Johnson. He is content, if his countrymen shall admit that his efforts, though imperfect, are not useless. And if any should severely insist, that he ought to have preserved so much caution through the work, as rarely to sink into negligence; and to have obtained so much knowledge of all its parts, as seldom to * fail by ignorance; he has only to hope that their frequent disappointment may be consoled by the following words: †"He that endureth no faults in men's writings must only read his own, wherein for the most part all appeareth white. Quotation, mistakes, inadvertency, expedition, and human lapses, may make not only moles, but warts, in learned authors; who notwithstanding, being judged by the capital matter, admit not of disparagement."

INTRODUCTION.

THE nature and design of the additions and alterations, which are made in the present publication of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, are explained in the preceding Advertisement. It remains to specify my obligations to others, in the preparation of the work; and to introduce to the reader's notice such other circumstances, connected with the progress of it, as it becomes me to state.

The first, and in my own opinion the most important, obligation which I have to acknowledge, is to [the late] James Boswell, Esq. of the Middle Temple, the son of the biographer of Johnson, the friend of the late Edmond Malone, and a zealous promoter of the cause of literature. Among the valuable books of Mr. Malone, consigned to the care of Mr. Boswell, there was a copy of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary interleaved, and bound in three volumes; in which Mr. Malone had "inserted a great number of additional words and examples omitted by Johnson." With the frankness, which distinguishes the real lover of learning, Mr. Boswell sent these volumes to me, of the existence of which I had not before known; allowing me, at the same time, to extract any of the observations which Mr. Malone had made, for the purpose of the present work. The accuracy and diligence of Mr. Malone could not but render the business of examining his volumes very pleasing; nor fail to afford abundant service towards the labour in which I was employed. His statement, at the beginning of the first of the volumes, is this: "1052 manuscript remarks in the three volumes of this most valuable Dictionary: for the greater part I am answerable: those to which D is subscribed, were written by Samuel Dyer."—Of these additional words and examples a large number is taken from the works of Bishop Hall in particular, and from those of other writers in the reigns of Elizabeth and her successor; most of which, in the course of my studies, had been long since selected also by myself; the fitness of which for my design, I was therefore proud to find corroborated by the judgement of Mr. Malone. That I have omitted many of his additions, I will not conceal; that I have, in particular cases, expressly summoned him to my aid, will be obvious; and that he would not have disdained the manner in which I have adopted any of his improvements, I am persuaded.

To the President and Fellows of Sion College, I am next to say that, in like manner, I am indebted for an unsolicited offer of the use of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, belonging to their library; in the margins of which, references to authors for examples where several words have none, and also some new words with examples, are pointed out by the late Rev. Mr. Bagshaw, of Bromley, one of the friends of Dr. Johnson. But they are principally mere references, in number about 600, and chiefly to our theological writers; of which some agree with examples cited by Mr. Malone or myself, and some with others which have appeared in Mr. Mason's Supplement to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary. Etymological remarks are rarely found among these proofs of Mr. Bagshaw's diligence. By the perusal of the whole, however, I have been much gratified, as well as often confirmed in matters which had before excited hesitation.

For the sight of an interleaved copy of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, which belonged to the late Rev. Mr. Henshall, I have been obliged to Messrs. Longman and Co. booksellers. The copy is formed into four volumes: that, which ends with the letter C, contains the most of his fanciful, however learned annotations: the rest are thinly sown with remarks. I am not aware of having derived advantage from this favour.

From the same gentlemen I received another copy of the Dictionary, filled with marginal remarks by the late Rev. Mr. Eyre. Though these remarks, like Mr. Bagshaw's, are mostly references; and though they are references principally to recent publications, as reviews and magazines, of which, at the beginning of the book, Mr. Eyre gives a list; as plays and novels also of our own days; one cannot but admire the indefatigable industry of the scholiast, in crowding the margins with words or sentences, intended (I should suppose in very many instances) rather for future consideration, than for decided addition. Had the same attention been paid to our old authors, the labour of Mr. Eyre would have been invaluable. Probably, not having access to many writers of this description, Mr. Eyre availed himself of the less useful information within his reach; and bestowed acute as well as diligent investigation upon objects not always deserving it. Sometimes, though rarely, he has given a citation from a book of elder times; a citation generally admissible. The writer of a future dictionary may perhaps often betake himself to this storehouse of information. What I have scrupled to adopt, may, at no distant period, demand, on increasing authority, admission into an English dictionary; and eccentrick terms, which have been employed by questionable writers to express common conceptions, may perhaps lose their novelty, or their quaintness, in sage and solemn usage.

There remains to be expressed another obligation to these gentlemen for the use of several books and papers, which were the property of the late Mr. Horne Tooke. Of these in due order. The first has been a copy of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary in two folio volumes, with marginal notes; in which there are not fifty that can be of service to any lexicographer, (as I perhaps mistakingly conceive,) who is in possession of the Diversions of Purley. This copy had been purchased at the sale of Mr. Tooke's library, and is said to have been intended by the purchaser to be the basis of a new English dictionary. By the purchaser, however, it was consigned to Messrs. Longman and Co.; and the publick will with me lament, that any intention should have been impeded, of which the furtherance might at once have crushed my humble attempt. At the beginning of this copy, there are the names of some authors entered; on the preface there are some remarks, not of the most liberal character; and to the history of the language, and to the grammar, there is no addition of importance. The Hermes of Mr. Harris, another of Mr. Tooke's books, abounding with his notes of haughtiest mood, has been of no use whatever to my purpose. His folio copy of Beaumont and Fletcher, with words marked in the margins, (an employment in which he was assisted by a distinguished living character,) has been of great service to me; being the same edition as that from which my own remarks had been formed, and thus by easy reference confirming my choice with respect to dubious expressions, as well as pointing out others which I had overpassed. The Gothick and Saxon dictionary of Lye, edited by Mr. Manning, was also among the printed volumes of Mr. Tooke entrusted to me; upon which the manuscript remarks afforded no intelligence of consequence. I come next to the observations upon our language, which Mr. Tooke left in manuscript books; at least such as I have examined. These were fifteen quarto books, containing the words of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary in regular order, with some additions, more particularly adverbs and substantives derived from adjectives; but without example, or other notice than the mere entry of the word. This employment occasionally suggested to me the introduction of such words into the dictionary, especially when I could support them by example. And therefore to this employment of Mr. Tooke I gladly acknowledge myself indebted. Six quarto books, containing words arranged according to terminations, as in and, ard, ed, est, &c. have been without use to me, however they might have been intended for some valuable purpose by Mr. Tooke. Of a quarto, entitled roots, which are Latin verbs, with English words stated to be derived from them, I found no occasion to avail myself. In another, entitled Gothic roots, consisting of not many written pages, there was little to be observed, which was not already in Lye. Out of three quartos, entitled Index Expurgatorius, or a list of such words as Mr. Tooke would have discharged from Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, I have made no selection; some, which he rejects, being supported by no mean authority; and some, being local, deserving to be retained. I think that in the letter A the arbitrary abolitions amount to about 800. Besides these books, there was a great variety of cards, upon which were written terminations entered in the quarto volumes, and other intended verbal arrangements. There was also one set, denouncing certain words as false English, and arranged according to terminations, which I have printed at the † close of this Dictionary; both as it is a specimen of the employment which I have been describing, and as a criticism, rarely to be questioned. Such is the account of the papers, left by Mr. Tooke, which I have seen; which indicate, I think, that he had once intended to compile an English Dictionary. If more had been left to show, that he had other illustrations to offer, not dissimilar to those which his Diversions of Purley had communicated, his friends would surely not have suffered them to slumber in inglorious silence. For that work, in which he has so acutely illustrated an ancient system, he has the thanks of every sound philologist; though it has been well remarked, that he has not laid in it, as he imagined, the foundation for future philosophers.

I am now to offer my thanks to the Rev. Archdeacon Churton, and the Rev. J. B. Blakeway; by whose remarks, communicated without solicitation, and without conditions, I have been, in several instances, materially assisted: to John Nichols, Esq. for the perusal of papers, illustrating our language, which were written by the late Dr. Pegge, and which offered, though mostly interwoven into his own publications, a gleaning or two to be gathered: to Roger Wilbraham, Esq. for the use of some uncommon books in his possession, and for some pertinent observations: and to Martin Whish, Esq. of whose attention, though directing me not seldom to what my own researches had also marked, I cannot express too grateful a sense, when I consider the largeness of the communications, and the liberality with which they were made. Some notices have been sent by others, whose good intentions I respect, in number and importance too inconsiderable to require further acknowledgment. Nor have I been without obligation, in the progress of my employment, to criticisms which wanted as well as to those which possessed the writer's name; in which, on the one hand, much wit has been employed upon what are justly termed my feeble exertions; and, on the other, indignation has hurled its thunderbolts at my presumption; in which, pretended illustrations and detections of mistake, (penned in the bewitching hours of self-delusion,) have been also proposed; which upon examination have only discovered how liable we all are to be deceived, and how much it behoves the maker or augmenter of a dictionary not always to rely implicitly upon proffered kindness, nor wholly to disregard the oppositions of sportive or malicious ingenuity.

That there may soon be new makers of an English dictionary, it is warrantable to conjecture, knowing, as I do, that other gentlemen have bestowed attention upon the subject; the incorporation of whose services, not altogether free from conditions, it was beyond my power, if it had been my wish, after my plan was formed, to make. The treasures which now remain in their own management, undispersed, may therefore, if the owners choose, be laid before the publick, without intermixture, and without omission.

The History of the English Language I have augmented with some new materials. To the Grammar I have added Notes, which are principally illustrative of orthography, and of the etymological system so powerfully recalled to modern notice by Mr. Tooke; to which are subjoined the grammatical remarks of Mr. Tyrwhitt upon our ancient language. For the convenience of the volumes, the Grammar has its * place in the last. After it † follows a List of Authors; of whom many perhaps might be considered too obscure to have been formally cited in the dictionary, if it could be denied, in the words of Johnson, that "‡ the riches of the English tongue are much greater than they are commonly supposed; that many useful and valuable books lie buried in shops and libraries unknown and unexamined, unless some lucky compiler opens them by chance, and finds an easy spoil of wit and learning." Of old authors, as of old words, let no one make too hasty a rejection. Sarcasm may expose its impotence, as well as ignorance, in arraigning either; unaccustomed to observe that from the one, (the partially "unknown and unexamined,") our best writers have occasionally not disdained to draw wisdom; and that with the other they have warranted the use of terms, which the jeer of modern hypercriticism would discard. It may be easy, though it is not "§ pleasant without scurrility," if I may use Sir Nathaniel's phrase, to present both words and sentences, with the juxta-position of a quaint title, in a manner so detached, as to excite no favourable opinion of the book, or rather to destroy all belief that it possesses any power of conveying knowledge. I might have omitted some citations from modern writers. But the canons yet remain to be promulged, by which the extremes of opposite tastes are to be settled. The precise period, at which antiquity is to be regarded as a rule, is not yet determined: the standard "‖ one inclines to remove to the distance of a century and a half; another may, with as good reason, fix it three centuries backwards; and another six." May we then expect decision upon these points from a society for refining the language, and fixing its standard? Alas, Johnson himself has told us, that "¶ the edicts of an English Academy would probably be read by many, only that they might be sure to disobey them!"

For the paucity of curious or satisfactory information, which my additions and alterations exhibit; and for the abundance of inaccuracies and faults which have escaped my care; I may not, I hope, solicit the pardon of the candid reader in vain. I should indeed have been thrown into irrecoverable confusion and dismay, in reconsidering what I have done, if for an humble attendant also there were not consolation in the words of the master, which first accompanied the fourth edition of his Dictionary.

* [In the present edition, it follows the History of the Language in the first volume.]

" Many are the works of human industry, which to begin and finish are hardly granted to the same man. He that undertakes to compile a Dictionary, undertakes that, which, if it comprehends the full extent of his design, he knows himself unable to perform. Yet his labours, though deficient, may be* useful, and, with the hope of this inferiour praise, he must incite his activity, and solace his weariness.

" Perfection is unattainable, but nearer and nearer approaches may be made: and finding my Dictionary about to be reprinted, I have endeavoured, by a revisal, to make it less reprehensible. I will not deny, that I found many parts requiring emendation, and many more capable of improvement. Many faults I have corrected, some superfluities I have taken away, and some deficiencies I have supplied. I have methodised some parts that were disordered, and illuminated some that were obscure. Yet the changes or additions bear a very small proportion to the whole. The critick will now have less to object, but the student who has bought any of the former copies needs not repent: he will not, without nice collation, perceive how they differ; and usefulness seldom depends upon little things.

" For negligence, or deficience, I have perhaps not need of more apology than the nature of the work will furnish: I have left that inaccurate which never was made exact, and that imperfect which never was completed."—

Of the present augmented edition of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary the proprietors, as I am informed, intend to publish as soon as possible, in the octavo size, an † abridgement; in which I have respectfully, and for unanswerable reasons, declined any concern whatever. And I now ‡ relinquish altogether the labours of lexicography, with the hope, that my omissions and imperfections may stimulate the accurate and the judicious so to form a dictionary of our language, as not to subject it to any of the animadversions which will be made on my attempt.

DR. JOHNSON'S PREFACE.

IT is the fate of those, who toil at the lower employments of life, to be rather driven by the fear of evil, than attracted by the prospect of good; to be exposed to censure, without hope of praise; to be disgraced by miscarriage, or punished for neglect, where success would have been without applause, and diligence without reward.

Among these unhappy mortals is the writer of dictionaries; whom mankind have considered, not as the pupil but the slave of science, the pioneer of literature, doomed only to remove rubbish and clear obstructions from the paths, through which Learning and Genius press forward to conquest and glory, without bestowing a smile on the humble drudge that facilitates their progress. Every other author may aspire to praise; the lexicographer can only hope to escape reproach, and even this negative recompense has been yet granted to very few.

I have, notwithstanding this discouragement, attempted a Dictionary of the English Language, which, while it was employed in the cultivation of every species of literature, has itself been hitherto neglected; suffered to spread, under the direction of chance, into wild exuberance; resigned to the tyranny of time and fashion; and exposed to the corruptions of ignorance and caprices of innovation.

When I took the first survey of my undertaking, I found our speech copious without order, and energetick without rules; wherever I turned my view, there was perplexity to be disentangled, and confusion to be regulated; choice was to be made out of boundless variety, without any established principle of selection; adulterations were to be detected, without a settled test of purity; and modes of expression to be rejected or received, without the suffrages of any writers of classical reputation or acknowledged authority.

Having therefore no assistance but from general grammar, I applied myself to the perusal of our writers; and, noting whatever might be of use to ascertain or illustrate any word or phrase, accumulated in time the materials of a dictionary, which, by degrees, I reduced to method, establishing to myself, in the progress of the work, such rules as experience and analogy suggested to me: experience, which practice and observation were continually increasing; and analogy, which, though in some words obscure, was evident in others.

In adjusting the ORTHOGRAPHY, which has been to this time unsettled and fortuitous, I found it necessary to distinguish those irregularities that are inherent in our tongue, and perhaps coeval with it, from others which the ignorance or negligence of later writers has produced. Every language has its anomalies, which, though inconvenient, and in themselves once unnecessary, must be tolerated among the imperfections of human things; and which require only to be registered, that they may not be increased, and ascertained, that they may not be confounded: but every language has likewise its improprieties and absurdities, which it is the duty of the lexicographer to correct or proscribe.

As language was at its beginning merely oral, all words of necessary or common use were spoken before they were written; and, while they were unfixed by any visible signs, must have been spoken with great diversity, as we now observe those, who cannot read, catch sounds imperfectly, and utter them negligently. When this wild and barbarous jargon was first reduced to an alphabet, every penman endeavoured to express, as he could, the sounds which he was accustomed to pronounce or to receive, and vitiated in writing such words as were already vitiated in speech. The powers of the letters, when they were applied to a new language, must have been vague and unsettled, and therefore different hands would exhibit the same sound by different combinations.

From this uncertain pronunciation arise in a great part the various dialects of the same country, which will always be observed to grow fewer, and less different, as books are multiplied; and, from this arbitrary representation of sounds by letters, proceeds that diversity of spelling observable in the Saxon remains, and I suppose in the first books of every nation, which perplexes or destroys analogy, and produces anomalous formations, that, being once incorporated, can never be afterwards dismissed or reformed.

Of this kind are the derivatives length from long, strength from strong, darling from dear, breadth from broad; from dry, drought, and from high, height, which Milton, in zeal for analogy, writes highth: "Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una?" to change all would be too much, and to change one is nothing.

This uncertainty is most frequent in the vowels, which are so capriciously pronounced, and so differently modified, by accident or affectation, not only in every province, but in every mouth, that to them, as is well known to etymologists, little regard is to be shown in the deduction of one language from another.

Such defects are not errours in orthography, but spots of barbarity impressed so deep in the English language, that criticism can never wash them away: these therefore must be permitted to remain untouched: but many words have likewise been altered by accident, or depraved by ignorance, as the pronunciation of the vulgar has been weakly followed; and some still continue to be variously written, as authors differ in their care or skill: of these it was proper to inquire the true orthography, which I have always considered as depending on their derivation, and have therefore referred them to their original languages: thus I write enchant, enchantment, enchanter, after the French, and incantation after the Latin; thus entire is chosen rather than intire, because it passed to us not from the Latin integer, but from the French entier.

Of many words it is difficult to say whether they were immediately received from the Latin or the French, since, at the time when we had dominions in France, we had Latin service in our churches. It is, however, my opinion, that the French generally supplies us; for we have few Latin words among the terms of domestick use, which are not French: but many French, which are very remote from Latin.

Even in words of which the derivation is apparent, I have been often obliged to sacrifice uniformity to custom; thus I write, in compliance with a numberless majority, convey and inveigh, deceit and receipt, fancy and phantom; sometimes the derivative varies from the primitive, as explain and explanation, repeat and repetition.

Some combinations of letters, having the same power, are used indifferently without any discoverable reason or choice, as in choak, choke; soap, sope; fewel, fuel, and many others; which I have sometimes inserted twice, that those, who search for them under either form, may not search in vain.

In examining the orthography of any doubtful word, the mode of spelling by which it is inserted in the series of the Dictionary, is to be considered as that to which I give, perhaps not often rashly, the preference. I have left, in the examples, to every author his own practice unmolested, that the reader may balance suffrages, and judge between us: but this question is not always to be determined by reputed or by real learning: some men, intent upon greater things, have thought little on sounds and derivations; some, knowing in the ancient tongues, have neglected those in which our words are commonly to be sought. Thus Hammond writes feciblenes for feasibleness, because I suppose he imagined it derived immediately from the Latin; and some words, such as dependant, dependent, dependance, dependence, vary their final syllable, as one or another language is present to the writer.

In this part of the work, where caprice has long wantoned without control, and vanity sought praise by petty reformation, I have endeavoured to proceed with a scholar's reverence for antiquity, and a grammarian's regard to the genius of our tongue. I have attempted a few alterations; and, among those few, perhaps the greater part is from the modern to the ancient practice; and I hope I may be allowed to recommend to those, whose thoughts have been perhaps employed too anxiously on verbal singularities, not to disturb, upon narrow views, or for minute propriety, the orthography of their fathers. It has been asserted, that for the law to be known, is of more importance than to be right. Change, says Hooker, is not made without inconvenience, even from worse to better. There is in constancy and stability a general and lasting advantage, which will always overbalance the slow improvements of gradual correction. Much less ought our written language to comply with the corruptions of oral utterance, or copy that which every variation of time or place makes different from itself, and imitate those changes which will again be changed, while imitation is employed in observing them.

This recommendation of steadiness and uniformity does not proceed from an opinion, that particular combinations of letters have much influence on human happiness; or that truth may not be successfully taught by modes of spelling fanciful and erroneous: I am not yet so lost in lexicography, as to forget that words are the daughters of earth, and that things are the sons of heaven. Language is only the instrument of science, and words are but the signs of ideas: I wish, however, that the instrument might be less apt to decay, and that signs might be permanent, like the things which they denote.

In settling the orthography, I have not wholly neglected the pronunciation, which I have directed, by printing an accent upon the acute or elevated syllable. It will sometimes be found, that the accent is placed by the author quoted, on a different syllable from that marked in the alphabetical series: it is then to be understood that custom has varied, or that the author has, in my opinion, pronounced wrong. Short directions are sometimes given where the sound of letters is irregular; and, if they are sometimes omitted, defect in such minute observations will be more easily excused, than superfluity.

In the investigation both of the orthography and signification of words, their ETYMOLOGY was necessarily to be considered, and they were therefore to be divided into primitives and derivatives. A primitive word is that which can be traced no further to any English root; thus circumspect, circumvent, circumstance, delude, concave, and complicate, though compounds in the Latin, are to us primitives. Derivatives are all those that can be referred to any word in English of greater simplicity.

The derivatives I have referred to their primitives with an accuracy sometimes needless; for who does not see that remoteness comes from remote, lovely from love, concavity from concave, and demonstrative from demonstrate? but this grammatical exuberance the scheme of my work did not allow me to repress. It is of great importance, in examining the general fabrick of a language, to trace one word from another, by noting the usual modes of derivation and inflection; and uniformity must be preserved in systematical works, though sometimes at the expense of particular propriety.

Among other derivatives I have been careful to insert and elucidate the anomalous plurals of nouns and preterits of verbs, which in the Teutonick dialects are very frequent, and, though familiar to those who have always used them, interrupt and embarrass the learners of our language.

The two languages from which our primitives have been derived are the Roman and Teutonick: under the Roman I comprehend the French and provincial tongues; and under the Teutonick range the Saxon, German, and all their kindred dialects. Most of our polysyllables are Roman, and our words of one syllable are very often Teutonick.

In assigning the Roman original, it has perhaps sometimes happened that I have mentioned only the Latin, when the word was borrowed from the French; and, considering myself as employed only in the illustration of my own language, I have not been very careful to observe whether the Latin word be pure or barbarous, or the French elegant or obsolete.

For the Teutonick etymologies I am commonly indebted to Junius and Skinner, the only names which I have forborne to quote when I copied their books; not that I might appropriate their labours or usurp their honours, but that I might spare a perpetual repetition by one general acknowledgment. Of these, whom I ought not to mention but with reverence due to instructors and benefactors, Junius appears to have excelled in extent of learning, and Skinner in rectitude of understanding. Junius was accurately skilled in all the northern languages; Skinner probably examined the ancient and remoter dialects only by occasional inspection into dictionaries; but the learning of Junius is often of no other use than to show him a track by which he might deviate from his purpose, to which Skinner always presses forward by the shortest way. Skinner is often ignorant, but never ridiculous: Junius is always full of knowledge; but his variety distracts his judgment, and his learning is very frequently disgraced by his absurdities.

The votaries of the northern Muses will not perhaps easily restrain their indignation, when they find the name of Junius thus degraded by a disadvantageous comparison; but whatever reference is due to his diligence, or his attainments, it can be no criminal degree of censoriousness to charge that etymologist with want of judgment, who can seriously derive dream from drama, because life is a drama and a drama is a dream; and who declares with a tone of defiance, that no man can fail to derive moan from μόνος, Gr. (monos,) single or solitary, who considers that grief naturally loves to be *alone.

Our knowledge of the northern literature is so scanty, that of words undoubtedly Teutonick the original is not always to be found in any ancient language; and I have therefore inserted Dutch or German substitutes, which I consider not as radical but parallel, not as the parents but sisters of the English.

The words, which are represented as thus related by descent or cognation, do not always agree in sense; for it is incident to words, as to their authors, to degenerate from their ancestors, and to change their manners when they change their country. It is sufficient, in etymological inquiries, if the senses of kindred words be found such as may easily pass into each other, or such as may both be referred to one general idea.

The etymology, so far as it is yet known, was easily found in the volumes where it is particularly and professedly delivered; and, by proper attention to the rules of derivation, the orthography was soon adjusted. But to COLLECT the WORDS of our language was a task of greater difficulty: the deficiency of dictionaries was immediately apparent; and, when they were exhausted, what was yet wanting must be sought by fortuitous and unguided excursions into books, and gleaned as industry should find, or chance should offer it, in the boundless chaos of a living speech. My search, however, has been either skilful or lucky; for I have much augmented the vocabulary.

As my design was a dictionary, common or appellative, I have omitted all words which have relation to proper names; such as Arian, Socinian, Calvinist, Benedictine, Mahometan; but have retained those of a more general nature, as Heathen, Pagan.

Of the terms of art I have received such as could be found either in books of science or technical dictionaries; and have often inserted, from philosophical writers, words which are supported perhaps only by a single authority; and which, being not admitted into general use, stand yet as candidates or probationers, and must depend for their adoption on the suffrage of futurity.

The words which our authors have introduced by their knowledge of foreign languages, or ignorance of their own, by vanity or wantonness, by compliance with fashion or lust of innovation, I have registered as they occurred, though commonly only to censure them and warn others against the folly of naturalizing useless foreigners to the injury of the natives.

I have not rejected any by design, merely because they were unnecessary or exuberant; but have received those which by different writers have been differently formed, as viscid and viscidity, viscous and viscosity.

Compounded or double words I have seldom noted, except when they obtain a signification different from that which the components have in their simple state. Thus highwayman, woodman, and horsecourser, require an explanation; but of thieflike or coachdriver no notice was needed, because the primitives contain the meaning of the compounds.

Words arbitrarily formed by a constant and settled analogy, like diminutive adjectives in ish, as greenish, bluish; adverbs in ly, as dully, openly; substantives in ness, as vileness, faultiness; were less diligently sought, and sometimes have been omitted, when I had no authority that invited me to insert them; not that they are not genuine and regular offsprings of English roots, but, because their relation to the primitive being always the same, their significations cannot be mistaken.

The verbal nouns in ing such as the keeping of the castle, leading of the army, are always neglected, or placed only to illustrate the sense of the verb, except when they signify things as well as actions, and have therefore a plural number, as dwelling, living; or have an absolute and abstract signification, as colouring, painting, learning.

The participles are likewise omitted, unless, by signifying rather habit or quality than action, they take the nature of adjectives: as a thinking man, a man of prudence; pacing horse, a horse that can pace: these I have ventured to call participial adjectives. But neither are these always inserted, because they are commonly to be understood, without any danger of mistake, by consulting the verb.

Obsolete words are admitted, when they are found in authors not obsolete, or when they have any force or beauty that may deserve revival.

As composition is one of the chief characteristicks of a language, I have endeavoured to make some reparation for the universal negligence of my predecessors, by inserting great numbers of compounded words as may be found under after, fore, new, night, fair, and many more. These, numerous as they are, might be multiplied, but that use and curiosity are here satisfied, and the frame of our language and modes of our combination amply discovered.

Of some forms of composition, such as that by which re is prefixed to note repetition, and un to signify contrariety or privation, all the examples cannot be accumulated, because the use of these particles, if not wholly arbitrary, is so little limited, that they are hourly affixed to new words as occasion requires or is imagined to require them.

There is another kind of composition more frequent in our language than perhaps in any other, from which arises to foreigners the greatest difficulty. We modify the signification of many words by a particle subjoined; as to come off, to escape by a fetch; to fall on, to attack; to fall off, to apostatize; to break off, to stop abruptly; to bear out, to justify; to fall in, to comply; to give over, to cease; to set off, to embellish; to set in, to begin a continual tenour; to set out, to begin a course or journey; to take off, to copy; with innumerable expressions of the same kind, of which some appear wildly irregular, being so far distant from the sense of the simple words, that no sagacity will be able to trace the steps by which they arrived at the present use. These I have noted with great care; and, though I cannot flatter myself that the collection is complete, I believe I have so far assisted the students of our language, that this kind of phraseology will be no longer insuperable; and the combinations of verbs and particles, by chance omitted, will be easily explained by comparison with those that may be found.

Many words yet stand supported only by the name of Bailey, Ainsworth, Phillips, or the contracted Dict. for Dictionaries subjoined; of these I am not always certain that they are read in any book but the works of lexicographers. Of such I have omitted many, because I had never read them; and many I have inserted, because they may perhaps exist, though they have escaped my notice: they are, however, to be yet considered as resting only upon the credit of former dictionaries. Others, which I considered as useful, or known to be proper, though I could not at present support them by authorities, I have suffered to stand upon my own attestation, claiming the same privilege with my predecessors, of being sometimes credited without proof.

The words, thus selected and disposed, are grammatically considered; they are referred to the different parts of speech; traced, when they are irregularly inflected, through their various terminations; and illustrated by observations, not indeed of great or striking importance, separately considered, but necessary to the elucidation of our language, and hitherto neglected or forgotten by English grammarians.

That part of my work on which I expect malignity most frequently to fasten is, the Explanation; in which I cannot hope to satisfy those, who are perhaps not inclined to be pleased, since I have not always been able to satisfy myself. To interpret a language by itself is very difficult; many words cannot be explained by synonymes, because the idea signified by them has not more than one appellation; nor by paraphrase, because simple ideas cannot be described. When the nature of things is unknown, or the notion unsettled and indefinite, and various in various minds, the words by which such notions are conveyed, or such things denoted, will be ambiguous and perplexed. And such is the fate of hapless lexicography, that not only darkness, but light, impedes and distresses it; things may be not only too little, but too much known, to be happily illustrated. To explain, requires the use of terms less abstruse than that which is to be explained, and such terms cannot always be found; for as nothing can be proved but by supposing something intuitively known, and evident without proof, so nothing can be defined but by the use of words too plain to admit a definition.

Other words there are, of which the sense is too subtle and evanescent to be fixed in a paraphrase; such are all those which are by the grammarians termed expletives, and, in dead languages, are suffered to pass for empty sounds, of no other use than to fill a verse, or to modulate a period, but which are easily perceived in living tongues to have power and emphasis, though it be sometimes such as no other form of expression can convey.

My labour has likewise been much increased by a class of verbs too frequent in the English language, of which the signification is so loose and general, the use so vague and indeterminate, and the senses detorted so widely from the first idea, that it is hard to trace them through the maze of variation, to catch them on the brink of utter inanity, to circumscribe them by any limitations, or interpret them by any words of distinct and settled meaning: such are, bear, break, come, cast, full, get, give, do, put, set, go, run, make, take, turn, throw. If of these the whole power is not accurately delivered, it must be remembered, that while our language is yet living, and variable by the caprice of every one that speaks it, these words are hourly shifting their relations, and can no more be ascertained in a dictionary, than a grove, in the agitation of a storm, can be accurately delineated from its picture in the water.

The particles are among all nations applied with so great latitude, that they are not easily reducible under any regular scheme of explication; this difficulty is not less, nor perhaps greater, in English, than in other languages. I have laboured them with diligence, I hope with success; such at least as can be expected in a task, which no man, however learned or sagacious, has yet been able to perform.

Some words there are which I cannot explain, because I do not understand them; these might have been omitted very often with little inconvenience, but I would not so far indulge my vanity as to decline this confession: for when Tully owns himself ignorant whether lessus, in the twelve tables, means a funeral song, or mourning garment; and Aristotle doubts whether οὖρευς, in the Iliad, signifies a mule, or muleteer, I may surely, without shame, leave some obscurities to happier industry, or future information.

The rigour of interpretative lexicography requires that the explanation, and the word explained, should be always reciprocal; this I have always endeavoured but could not always attain. Words are seldom exactly synonymous; a new term was not introduced, but because the former was thought inadequate; names, therefore, have often many ideas, but few ideas have many names. It was then necessary to use the proximate word; for the deficiency of single terms can very seldom be supplied by circumlocution; nor is the inconvenience great of such mutilated interpretations, because the sense may easily be collected entire from the examples.

In every word of extensive use, it was requisite to mark the progress of its meaning, and show by what gradations of intermediate sense it has passed from its primitive to its remote and accidental signification; so that every foregoing explanation should tend to that which follows, and the series be regularly concatenated from the first notion to the last.

This is specious but not always practicable; kindred senses may be so interwoven, that the perplexity cannot be disentangled, nor any reason be assigned why one should be ranged before the other. When the radical idea branches out into parallel ramifications, how can a consecutive series be formed of senses in their nature collateral? The shades of meaning sometimes pass imperceptibly into each other; so that on one side they apparently differ, yet it is impossible to mark the point of contact. Ideas of the same race, though not exactly alike, are sometimes so little different, that no words can express the dissimilitude though the mind easily perceives it, when they are exhibited together: and sometimes there is such a confusion of acceptations, that discernment is wearied, and distinction puzzled, and perseverance herself hurries to an end, by crowding together what she cannot separate.

These complaints of difficulty will, by those that have never considered words beyond their popular use, be thought only the jargon of a man willing to magnify his labours, and procure veneration to his studies by involution and obscurity. But every art is obscure to those that have not learned it: this uncertainty of terms, and commixture of ideas, is well known to those who have joined philosophy with grammar; and if I have not expressed them very clearly, it must be remembered that I am speaking of that which words are insufficient to explain.

The original sense of words is often driven out of use by their metaphorical acceptations, yet must be inserted for the sake of a regular origination. Thus I know not whether ardour is used for material heat, or whether flagrant, in English, ever signifies the same with burning; yet such are the primitive ideas of these words, which are therefore set first, though without examples, that the figurative senses may be commodiously deduced.

Such is the exuberance of signification which many words have obtained, that it was scarcely possible to collect all their senses; sometimes the meaning of derivatives must be sought in the mother term, and sometimes deficient explanations of the primitive may be supplied in the train of derivation. In any case of doubt or difficulty, it will be always proper to examine all the words of the same race; for some words are slightly passed over to avoid repetition; some admitted easier and clearer explanation than others; and all will be better understood, as they are considered in greater variety of structures and relations.

All the interpretations of words are not written with the same skill, or the same happiness: things, equally easy in themselves, are not all equally easy to any single mind. Every writer of a long work commits errours, where there appears neither ambiguity to mislead, nor obscurity to confound him: and, in a search like this, many felicities of expression will be casually overlooked, many convenient parallels will be forgotten, and many particulars will admit improvement from a mind utterly unequal to the whole performance.

But many seeming faults are to be imputed rather to the nature of the undertaking, than the negligence of the performer. Thus some explanations are unavoidably reciprocal or circular, as hind, the female of the stag; stag, the male of the hind: sometimes easier words are changed into harder, as burial into sepulture or interment, drier into desiccative, dryness into siccity or aridity, fit into paroxysm; for the easiest word, whatever it be, can never be translated into one more easy. But easiness and difficulty are merely relative; and, if the present prevalence of our language should invite foreigners to this Dictionary, many will be assisted by those words which now seem only to increase or produce obscurity. For this reason I have endeavoured frequently to join a Teutonick or Roman interpretation, as to CHEER, to gladden, or exhilarate, that every learner of English may be assisted by his own tongue.

The solution of all difficulties, and the supply of all defects, must be sought in the examples, subjoined to the various senses of each word, and ranged according to the time of their authors.

When first I collected these authorities, I was desirous that every quotation should be useful to some other end than the illustration of a word; I therefore extracted from philosophers principles of science; from historians remarkable facts; from chymists complete processes; from divines striking exhortations; and from poets beautiful descriptions. Such is design, while it is yet at a distance from execution. When the time called upon me to range this accumulation of elegance and wisdom into an alphabetical series, I soon discovered that the bulk of my volumes would fright away the student, and was forced to depart from my scheme of including all that was pleasing or useful in English literature, and reduce my transcripts very often to clusters of words, in which scarcely any meaning is retained: thus to the weariness of copying, I was condemned to add the vexation of expunging. Some passages I have yet spared, which may relieve the labour of verbal searches, and intersperse with verdure and flowers the dusty deserts of barren philology.

The examples thus mutilated, are no longer to be considered as conveying the sentiments or doctrine of their authors; the word for the sake of which they are inserted, with all its appendant clauses, has been carefully preserved; but it may sometimes happen, by hasty detruncation, that the general tendency of the sentence may be changed: the divine may desert his tenets, or the philosopher his system.

Some of the examples have been taken from writers who were never mentioned as masters of elegance or models of style; but words must be sought where they are used; and in what pages, eminent for purity, can terms of manufacture or agriculture be found? Many quotations serve-no other purpose, than that of proving the bare existence of words, and are therefore selected with less scrupulousness than those which are to teach their structures and relations.

My purpose was to admit no testimony of living authors, that I might not be misled by partiality, and that none of my contemporaries might have reason to complain; nor have I departed from this resolution, but when some performance of uncommon excellence excited my veneration, when my memory supplied me from late books with an example that was wanting, or when my heart in the tenderness of friendship solicited admission for a favourite name.

So far have I been from any care to grace my pages with modern decorations, that I have studiously endeavoured to collect examples and authorities from the writers before the Restoration, whose works I regard as the wells of English undefiled, as the pure sources of genuine diction. Our language, for almost a century, has, by the concurrence of many causes, been gradually departing from its original Teutonick character, and deviating toward a Gallick structure and phraseology, from which it ought to be our endeavour to recall it, by making our ancient volumes the groundwork of style, admitting among the additions of later times only such as may supply real deficiencies, such as are readily adopted by the genius of our tongue, and incorporate easily with our native idioms.

But as every language has a time of rudeness antecedent to perfection, as well as of false refinement and declension, I have been cautious lest my zeal for antiquity might drive me into times too remote, and crowd my book with words now no longer understood. I have fixed Sidney's work for the boundary, beyond which I make few excursions. From the authors, which rose in the time of Elizabeth, a speech might be formed adequate to all the purposes of use and elegance. If the language of theology were extracted from Hooker and the Translation of the Bible; the terms of natural knowledge from Bacon; the phrases of policy, war, and navigation, from Ralegh; the dialect of poetry and fiction from Spenser and Sidney; and the diction of common life from Shakspeare, few ideas would be lost to mankind for want of English words in which they might be expressed.

It is not sufficient that a word is found, unless it be so combined as that its meaning is apparently determined by the tract and tenour of the sentence; such passages I have therefore chosen; and when it happened that any author gave a definition of a term, or such an explanation as is equivalent to a definition, I have placed his authority as a supplement to my own, without regard to the chronological order that is otherwise observed.

Some words, indeed, stand unsupported by any authority, but they are commonly derivative nouns or adverbs, formed from their primitives by regular and constant analogy, or names of things seldom occurring in books, or words of which I have reason to doubt the existence.

There is more danger of censure from the multiplicity than paucity of examples; authorities will sometimes seem to have been accumulated without necessity or use, and perhaps some will be found, which might, without loss, have been omitted. But a work of this kind is not hastily to be charged with superfluities: those quotations, which to careless or unskilful perusers appear only to repeat the same sense, will often exhibit, to a more accurate examiner, diversities of significations, or, at least, afford different shades of the same meaning: one will show the word applied to persons, another to things; one will express an ill, another a good, and a third a neutral sense; one will prove the expression genuine from an ancient author; another will show it elegant from a modern: a doubtful authority is corroborated by another of more credit; an ambiguous sentence is ascertained by a passage clear and determinate; the word, how often soever repeated, appears with new associates and in different combinations; and every quotation contributes something to the stability or enlargement of the language.

When words are used equivocally, I receive them in either sense; when they are metaphorical, I adopt them in their primitive acceptation.

I have sometimes, though rarely, yielded to the temptation of exhibiting a genealogy of sentiments, by showing how one author copied the thoughts and diction of another: such quotations are indeed little more than repetitions, which might justly be censured, did they not gratify the mind, by affording a kind of intellectual history.

The various syntactical structures occurring in the examples have been carefully noted; the licence or negligence, with which many words have been hitherto used, has made our style capricious and indeterminate: when the different combinations of the same word are exhibited together, the preference is readily given to propriety, and I have often endeavoured to direct the choice.

Thus I have laboured, by settling the orthography, displaying the analogy, regulating the structures, and ascertaining the signification of English words, to perform all the parts of a faithful lexicographer: but I have not always executed my own scheme, or satisfied my own expectations. The work, whatever proofs of diligence and attention it may exhibit, is yet capable of many improvements: the orthography which I recommend is still controvertible; the etymology which I adopt is uncertain, and perhaps frequently erroneous; the explanations are sometimes too much contracted, and sometimes too much diffused; the significations are distinguished rather with subtilty than skill, and the attention is harassed with unnecessary minuteness.

The examples are too often injudiciously truncated, and perhaps sometimes, I hope very rarely, alleged in a mistaken sense; for in making this collection I trusted more to memory, than, in a state of disquiet and embarrassment, memory can contain; and purposed to supply at the review what was left incomplete in the first transcription.

Many terms appropriated to particular occupations though necessary and significant, are undoubtedly omitted; and of the words most studiously considered and exemplified, many senses have escaped observation.

Yet these failures, however frequent, may admit extenuation and apology. To have attempted much is always laudable, even when the enterprise is above the strength that undertakes it: to rest below his own aim is incident to every one whose fancy is active, and whose views are comprehensive; nor is any man satisfied with himself because he has done much, but because he can conceive little. When first I engaged in this work, I resolved to leave neither words nor things unexamined, and pleased myself with a prospect of the hours which I should revel away in feasts of literature, with the obscure recesses of northern learning which I should enter and ransack, the treasures with which I expected every search into those neglected mines to reward my labour, and the triumph with which I should display my acquisitions to mankind. When I had thus inquired into the original of words, I resolved to show likewise my attention to things; to pierce deep into every science, to inquire the nature of every substance of which I inserted the name, to limit every idea by a definition strictly logical, and exhibit every production of art or nature in an accurate description, that my book might be in place of all other dictionaries whether appellative or technical. But these were the dreams of a poet, doomed at last to wake a lexicographer. I soon found that it is too late to look for instruments, when the work calls for execution; and that whatever abilities I had brought to my task, with those I must finally perform it. To deliberate whenever I doubted, to inquire whenever I was ignorant, would have protracted the undertaking without end, and, perhaps, without much improvement; for I did not find by my first experiments, that what I had not of my own was easily to be obtained; I saw that one inquiry only gave occasion to another, that book referred to book, that to search was not always to find, and to find was not always to be informed; and thus to pursue perfection, was, like the first inhabitants of Arcadia, to chase the sun, which, when they had reached the hill where he seemed to rest, was still beheld at the same distance from them.

I then contracted my design, determining to confide in myself, and no longer to solicit auxiliaries, which produced more incumbrance than assistance; by this I obtained at least one advantage, that I set limits to my work, which would in time be ended, though not completed.

Despondency has never so far prevailed as to depress me to negligence; some faults will at last appear to be the effects of anxious diligence and persevering activity. The nice and subtle ramifications of meaning were not easily avoided by a mind intent upon accuracy, and convinced of the necessity of disentangling combinations, and separating similitudes. Many of the distinctions which to common readers appear useless and idle, will be found real and important by men versed in the school philosophy, without which no dictionary can ever be accurately compiled, or skilfully examined.

Some senses however there are, which, though not the same, are yet so nearly allied, that they are often confounded. Most men think indistinctly, and therefore cannot speak with exactness; and consequently some examples might be indifferently put to either signification: this uncertainty is not to be imputed to me, who do not form but register the language; who do not teach men how they should think, but relate how they have hitherto expressed their thoughts.

The imperfect sense of some examples I lamented, but could not remedy, and hope they will be compensated by innumerable passages selected with propriety, and preserved with exactness; some shining with sparks of imagination, and some replete with treasures of wisdom.

The orthography and etymology, though imperfect, are not imperfect for want of care, but because care will not always be successful, and recollection or information come too late for use.

That many terms of art and manufacture are omitted, must be frankly acknowledged; but for this defect I may boldly allege that it was unavoidable: I could not visit caverns to learn the miner's language, nor take a voyage to perfect my skill in the dialect of navigation, nor visit the warehouses of merchants, and shops of artificers, to gain the names of wares, tools, and operations, of which no mention is found in books; what favourable accident, or easy inquiry, brought within my reach, has not been neglected: but it had been a hopeless labour to glean up words, by courting living information, and contesting with the sullenness of one, and the roughness of another.

To furnish the academicians della Crusca with words of this kind, a series of comedies called la Fiera, or the Fair, was professedly written by Buonarotti; but I had no such assistant, and therefore was content to want what they must have wanted likewise, had they not luckily been so supplied.

Nor are all words, which are not found in the vocabulary, to be lamented as omissions. Of the laborious and mercantile part of the people, the diction is in a great measure casual and mutable; many of their terms are formed for some temporary or local convenience, and, though current at certain times and places, are in others utterly unknown. This fugitive cant, which is always in a state of increase or decay, cannot be regarded as any part of the durable materials of a language, and therefore must be suffered to perish with other things unworthy of preservation.

Care will sometimes betray to the appearance of negligence. He, that is catching opportunities which seldom occur, will suffer those to pass by unregarded which he expects hourly to return; he, that is searching for rare and remote things, will neglect those that are obvious and familiar: thus many of the most common and cursory words have been inserted with little illustration, because, in gathering the authorities, I forbore to copy those which I thought likely to occur whenever they were wanted. It is remarkable that, in reviewing my collection, I found the word SEA unexemplified.

Thus it happens, that in things difficult there is danger from ignorance, and in things easy from confidence; the mind, afraid of greatness and disdainful of littleness, hastily withdraws herself from painful searches, and passes with scornful rapidity over tasks not adequate to her powers; sometimes too secure for caution, and again too anxious for vigorous effort; sometimes idle in a plain path, and sometimes distracted in labyrinths, and dissipated by different intentions.

A large work is difficult because it is large, even though all its parts might singly be performed with facility; where there are many things to be done, each must be allowed its share of time and labour, in the proportion only which it bears to the whole; nor can it be expected, that the stones which form the dome of a temple, should be squared and polished like the diamond of a ring.

Of the event of this work, for which, having laboured it with so much application, I cannot but have some degree of parental fondness, it is natural to form conjectures. Those, who have been persuaded to think well of my design, will require that it should fix our language, and put a stop to those alterations which time and chance have hitherto been suffered to make in it without opposition. With this consequence I will confess that I flattered myself for a while; but now begin to fear, that I have indulged expectation which neither reason nor experience can justify. When we see men grow old and die at a certain time one after another, from century to century, we laugh at the elixir that promises to prolong life to a thousand years; and with equal justice may the lexicographer be derided, who, being able to produce no example of a nation that has preserved their words and phrases from mutability, shall imagine that his dictionary can embalm his language, and secure it from corruption and decay; that it is in his power to change sublunary nature, and clear the world at once from folly, vanity, and affectation.

With this hope, however, academies have been instituted, to guard the avenues of their languages, to retain fugitives, and repulse intruders; but their vigilance and activity have hitherto been vain; sounds are too volatile and subtile for legal restraints; to enchain syllables, and to lash the wind, are equally the undertakings of pride, unwilling to measure its desires by its strength. The French language has visibly changed under the inspection of the academy; the style of Amelot's translation of father Paul is observed by Le Courayer to be un peu passé; and no Italian will maintain, that the diction of any modern writer is not perceptibly different from that of Boccace, Machiavel, or Caro.

Total and sudden transformations of a language seldom happen; conquests and migrations are now very rare; but there are other causes of change, which, though slow in their operation, and invisible in their progress, are perhaps as much superiour to human resistance, as the revolutions of the sky, or intumescence of the tide. Commerce, however necessary, however lucrative, as it depraves the manners, corrupts the language; they that have frequent intercourse with strangers, to whom they endeavour to accommodate themselves, must in time learn a mingled dialect, like the jargon which serves the traffickers on the Mediterranean and Indian coasts. This will not always be confined to the exchange, the warehouse, or the port, but will be communicated by degrees to other ranks of the people, and be at last incorporated with the current speech.

There are likewise internal causes equally forcible. The language most likely to continue long without alteration would be that of a nation raised a little, and but a little, above barbarity, secluded from strangers, and totally employed in procuring the conveniences of life; either without books, or like some of the Mahometan countries, with very few: men thus busied and unlearned, having only such words as common use requires, would perhaps long continue to express the same notions by the same signs. But no such constancy can be expected in a people polished by arts, and classed by subordination, where one part of the community is sustained and accommodated by the labour of the other. Those, who have much leisure to think, will always be enlarging the stock of ideas; and every increase of knowledge, whether real or fancied, will produce new words, or combinations of words. When the mind is unchained from necessity, it will range after convenience; when it is left at large in the fields of speculation, it will shift opinions; as any custom is disused, the words that expressed it must perish with it; as any opinion grows popular, it will innovate speech in the same proportion as it alters practice.

As by the cultivation of various sciences, a language is amplified, it will be more furnished with words deflected from their original sense; the geometrician will talk of a courtier's zenith, or the eccentrick virtue of a wild hero; and the physician of sanguine expectations and phlegmatick delays. Copiousness of speech will give opportunities to capricious choice, by which some words will be preferred, and others degraded; vicissitudes of fashion will enforce the use of new, or extend the signification of known terms. The tropes of poetry will make hourly encroachments, and the metaphorical will become the current sense: pronunciation will be varied by levity or ignorance, and the pen must at length comply with the tongue; illiterate writers will, at one time or other, by public infatuation, rise into renown, who, not knowing the original import of words, will use them with colloquial licentiousness, confound distinction, and forget propriety. As politeness increases, some expressions will be considered as too gross and vulgar for the delicate, others as too formal and ceremonious for the gay and airy; new phrases are therefore adopted, which must, for the same reasons, be in time dismissed. Swift, in his petty treatise on the English language, allows that new words must sometimes be introduced, but proposes that none should be suffered to become obsolete. But what makes a word obsolete, more than general agreement to forbear it? and how shall it be continued, when it conveys an offensive idea, or recalled again into the mouths of mankind, when it has once become unfamiliar by disuse, and unpleasing by unfamiliarity?

There is another cause of alteration more prevalent than any other, which yet in the present state of the world cannot be obviated. A mixture of two languages will produce a third distinct from both; and they will always be mixed, where the chief part of education, and the most conspicuous accomplishment, is skill in ancient or in foreign tongues. He that has long cultivated another language, will find its words and combinations crowd upon his memory; and haste and negligence, refinement and affectation, will obtrude borrowed terms and exotick expressions.

The great pest of speech is frequency of translation. No book was ever turned from one language into another, without imparting something of its native idiom; this is the most mischievous and comprehensive innovation; single words may enter by thousands, and the fabrick of the tongue continue the same; but new phraseology changes much at once; it alters not the single stones of the building, but the order of the columns. If an academy should be established for the cultivation of our style, which I, who can never wish to see dependence multiplied, hope the spirit of English liberty will hinder or destroy, let them, instead of compiling grammars and dictionaries, endeavour with all their influence, to stop the licence of translators, whose idleness and ignorance, if it be suffered to proceed, will reduce us to babble a dialect of France.

If the changes that we fear be thus irresistible, what remains but to acquiesce with silence, as in the other insurmountable distresses of humanity? It remains that we retard what we cannot repel, that we palliate what we cannot cure. Life may be lengthened by care, though death cannot be ultimately defeated: tongues, like governments, have a natural tendency to degeneration; we have long preserved our constitution, let us make some struggles for our language.

In hope of giving longevity to that which its own nature forbids to be immortal, I have devoted this book, the labour of years, to the honour of my country, that we may no longer yield the palm of philology, without a contest, to the nations of the continent. The chief glory of every people arises from its authors: whether I shall add any thing by my own writings to the reputation of English literature, must be left to time: much of my life has been lost under the pressures of disease; much has been trifled away; and much has always been spent in provision for the day that was passing over me; but I shall not think my employment useless or ignoble, if by my assistance foreign nations, and distant ages, gain access to the propagators of knowledge, and understand the teachers of truth; if my labours afford light to the repositories of science, and add celebrity to Bacon, to Hooker, to Milton, and to Boyle.

When I am animated by this wish, I look with pleasure on my book, however defective, and deliver it to the world with the spirit of a man that has endeavoured well. That it will immediately become popular I have not promised to myself: a few wild blunders, and risible absurdities, from which no work of such multiplicity was ever free, may for a time furnish folly with laughter, and harden ignorance in contempt; but useful diligence will at last prevail, and there never can be wanting some who distinguish desert; who will consider that no dictionary of a living tongue ever can be perfect, since, while it is hastening to publication, some words are budding, and some falling away; that a whole life cannot be spent upon syntax and etymology, and that even a whole life would not be sufficient; that he, whose design includes whatever language can express, must often speak of what he does not understand; that a writer will sometimes be hurried by eagerness to the end, and sometimes faint with weariness under a task, which Scaliger compares to the labours of the anvil and the mine; that what is obvious is not always known, and what is known is not always present; that sudden fits of inadvertency will surprise vigilance, slight avocations will seduce attention, and casual eclipses of the mind will darken learning; and that the writer shall often in vain trace his memory, at the moment of need, for that which yesterday he knew with intuitive readiness, and which will come uncalled into his thoughts to-morrow.

In this work, when it shall be found that much is omitted, let it not be forgotten that much likewise is performed; and though no book was ever spared out of tenderness to the author, and the world is little solicitous to know whence proceeded the faults of that which it condemns; yet it may gratify curiosity to inform it, that the English Dictionary was written with little assistance of the learned, and without any patronage of the great; not in the soft obscurities of retirement, or under the shelter of academick bowers, but amid inconvenience and distraction, in sickness and in sorrow. It may repress the triumph of malignant criticism to observe, that if our language is not here fully displayed, I have only failed in an attempt which no human powers have hitherto completed. If the lexicons of ancient tongues, now immutably fixed, and comprised in a few volumes, be yet, after the toil of successive ages, inadequate and delusive; if the aggregated knowledge and co-operating diligence of the Italian academicians, did not secure them from the censure of Beni; if the embodied criticks of France, when fifty years had been spent upon their work, were obliged to change its economy, and give their second edition another form, I may surely be contented without the praise of perfection, which, if I could obtain, in this gloom of solitude, what would it avail me? I have protracted my work till most of those whom I wished to please have sunk into the grave, and success and miscarriage are empty sounds; I therefore dismiss it with frigid tranquillity, having little to fear or hope from censure or from praise.

[Section I. Fabrick and Scheme of the English Language, Gothick or Teutonick.]

I. THOUGH the Britains or Welsh were the first possessors of this island, whose names are recorded, and are therefore in civil history always considered as the predecessors of the present inhabitants; yet the deduction of the English language, from the earliest times of which we have any knowledge to its present state, requires no mention of them: for we have (a) so few words, which can, with any probability, be referred to British roots, that we justly regard the Saxons and Welsh, as nations totally distinct. It has been conjectured, that when the Saxons seized this country, they suffered the Britains to live among them in a state of vassalage, employed in the culture of the ground, and other laborious and ignoble services. But it is scarcely possible, that a nation, however depressed, should have been mixed with another in considerable numbers without some communication of their tongue, and therefore it may, with great reason, be imagined, that those, who were not sheltered in the mountains, perished by the sword.

(a) [So few words, &c. Mr. Horne Tooke says, that "our language has absolutely nothing from the Welsh." Div. of Purley, vol. 2. p. 311. On the other hand, Mr. Ellis asserts, that "there are good reasons for believing, that near one third of our language is of Welsh origin." Metr. Romances, 2d edit. vol. 1. p. 112. Of these opposite assertions the following remark may seem a judicious modification. "The British, to speak plainly, has little or no resemblance to the English. Many of their terms may have gained admission among us; as from the vicinity and long intercourse we have had with that people may necessarily be imagined; but their idioms and genius are as radically and essentially different as any two languages can possibly be." Rev. Mr. Drake on the Orig. of the Eng. Lang. Archæol. vol. 5. p. 317.]

The whole fabrick and scheme of the English language is Gothick or Teutonick: it is a dialect of that tongue, which prevails (b) over all the northern countries of Europe except those where the Sclavonian is spoken. Of these languages Dr. Hickes has thus exhibited the genealogy:

GOTHICK.

Anglo-Saxon,	Francick,	Cimbrick,
Dutch,	German.	(c) Icelandick,
Frisick,		Norwegian,
English.		Swedish,
		Danish.

Of the Gothick, the only monument remaining is a copy of the Gospels somewhat mutilated, which, from the silver with which the characters are adorned, is called the (d) Silver Book. It is

(b) [Over all the northern countries, &c. This is curiously illustrated by a grammarian of elder times. "Another propertie of an excellent language is the generalitie or large extent thereof; wherein no tongue within Christendome may compare with ours. For the Germans, of whom our fathers (the Saxons, Juites, and Angles,) are a part, have spred themselves, and their Teutonick tongue, (though in divers dialects, which time hath caused,) thorow all High and Low Germanie, their primarie habitation; but also in divers other countries, where their victorious hand, enlarging still their territories, hath seated them; as in Denmarke, Suedland, Lapland, Finland, Gotland, Norwey, England, and the East Part of Scotland, even from Barweeke to the Orcades, now the Isles of Orkney: which the very language, differing but little, in dialect, from the Northern or older English, doeth shew. And therefore the Highland or Westerne Scots, (which indeede are the right Scots, speaking the Scottish or Irish tongue,) doe call the Easterlings or Law-land-men (as the Welch doe us) Sassons or Saxons. Likewise in the other Northern Isles; as Groenland, Freesland, Iseland, &c. even to the hyperborean or frozen sea. Neither onely these Northerne parts, but the South countries also, wheresoever they set their foote, have yeelded to their puissance: as France, subdued by their Franks and Normans; Africk, over-run by their Vandals; and Italie, by their Lombards, Gothes, and Vandals: though in these parts their language be mixt and much corrupted with the speeche of the conquered people, whom they suffered to remaine among them. So that, not without cause, hath this manly nation obtained the name of German or Alman; which are both one; ger, or gar, signifying in the Teutonick, as much as all." The English Grammar, &c. by Charles Butler, 1633. Pref.]

(c) [Ex bibliis Icelandicis, non minus ferè quàm ex Saxonicis monumentis, vernaculæ nostræ originis pretendæ sunt. Hickes. The aspirations of the consonants, so frequent in the English, are the leading marks of a northern derivation; so that an Icelander, hearing this in the mouth of an Englishman, will go no farther than to his own language, and is sure to find either the word, or the root of it, with very few alterations. Serenius.]

(d) [The Silver Book. The leaves are of vellum of a violet colour. All the letters are of silver, except the initials, which are of gold. See Notes on the Transl. of Mallet's North. Antiq. ch. 13. The high antiquity of thus distinguishing valuable, and particularly sacred writings, is found in Josephus, Antiq. Jud. lib. xii. cap. 2. See also Baringii Clavis Diplomatica, p. 171. The publication of the Silver Book by Lye, to which Dr. Johnson alludes, was in 1750. Since that time, another portion of this ancient version has been discovered in the library at Wolfenbottel, in Germany; which is part of the epistle to the Romans, and was published in 1761 by the Rev. F. A. Knittel, Archdeacon of Wolfenbottel; afterwards by Ihre. It has since occupied a place in the Appendix to the valuable edition of Lye's Goth. & Sax. Dict. by the Rev. O. Manning. Of eight of St. Paul's Epistles, at least in part, a recent discovery also (1817) is said to have been made, in the Ambrosian library at Milan, by the Abbé Angelo Mai, one of the librarians; of which the publication is earnestly expected.

The doubt, which Dr. Johnson notices, in regard to the diction of the Silver Book, alludes especially to the opinions of Hickes and Bishop Nicolson, who consider "some Teuton or German as the author of it." Michaelis and others have contended that it is rather a fragment of some very ancient Francick Bible. To these objections, Dean Serenius has adverted, asserting that it is "no German or Francick dialect, as learned men have contended now preserved at Upsal, and having been twice published before, has been lately reprinted at Oxford, under the inspection of Mr. Lye, the editor of Junius. Whether the diction of this venerable manuscript be purely Gothick, has been doubted; it seems, however, to exhibit the most ancient dialect now to be found of the Teutonick race; and the Saxon, which is the original of the present English, was either derived from it, or both have descended from some common parent.

[Section II. Specimen of the Gothick Language.]

II. [From the venerable monument, of which so much has been said in the notes to the preceding section, I select the Lord's Prayer; and place, in the opposite column, the ancient Anglo-Saxon version of the same; both in English characters, that the benefit of comparison with our present language may be within the reach of every reader.

(e) M. Gothick.

and disputed on both sides of the question; but the same aboriginal language, then living, and spoken, by the Goths seated upon Mœotis, when Ulphilas was their bishop, and translated the four Gospels." Swed. and Eng. Dict. 2d edit. 1757. pref. p. 5. The Gothick claim has indeed found numerous and able supporters; and has been strengthened by a curious relick of the same language discovered in Italy. The following statement combines the arguments of those who have vindicated the claim; of Knittel, Ihre, and others.

1. " Scilicet, id certum est è veterum testimoniis fuisse interpretationem ejusmodi Geticam: de Francicâ quâdam nihil apud veteres habetur.

2. " Deinde vera historia docet, Ulphilan Getas literis donasse, iisdemque suam librorum sacrorum interpretationem conscripsisse. Itaque cum veterem interpretationem Teutonicam, quæ quidem literis, non modò à Latinis sed dimidiam minimùm partem à Græcis mutuò sumptis, consignata sit in manibus habeamus; hæc profectò sermone Getarum, ad Istrum olim habitantium, scripta esse dici debebit. Moesi autem, quorum in regionem penetraverunt, Latinè locuti sunt; Getisque finitimi Græci fuerunt.

3. " Tum etiam Codex, qui vocatur Argenteus, magnam vocabulorum vim complectitur, quorum in Francicâ ne vestigium quidèm deprehendimus.

4. " Nec parum huc momenti affert, quòd Wachterus (Gloss. Germ. p. 43.) vocabula quædam, Codicis Argentei propria, in Tartariâ Minori, Getarum quondam sede, invenerit; cujusmodi est swilten, mori, à swalt, mors.

5. " Quo et illud pertinet, quòd Ulphilana interpretatio non pauca Græcorum vocabula civitate suâ donaverit, non illa, linguis Teutonicis cum Græcâ ab ultimâ inde antiquitate communia; è quibus eandem populorum originem, vel priscum aliquod commercium, efficere solemus; sed ea vocabula, quibus omnes omninò Teutonicæ septentrionalesque dialecti careant: atque in his nonnulla, quæ, nisi perfectâ jam linguæ utriusque facie, illuc profecta non fuere. Exemplum sit atta, ἀτὰ, pater.

6. " Huc accedunt vocabula et Illyrica, quæ neque in dialectis Teutonicis reperiuntur, neque gentem produnt à Getis longè remotam;

7. " Et Latina; non ea eruditionem, artes resque sacras (qualia et apud Francos permulta sunt) spectantia: sed alia, neque Rhenum inter ac Viadrum unquam audita.

8. " Ne verò amplius dubites, faciunt vocabula quædam, quæ Getica dixere veteres. At hæc quidèm, ceteris in dialectis Teutonicis non obvia, in Codice Argenteo et Carolino invenias.

9. " Denique inter inscriptiones Donianas, à Gorio denuò editas Florentiæ, 1731. Class. 19. n. 11. villæ cujusdam venditæ pactum est, cui subscripserunt eâdem planè linguâ, iisdemque literis, quibus conscriptus est Codex Argenteus. His autem in terris (namque Areti, hodiè Arezzo vocant, exstat monimentum) nunquam alia, præter Geticam, gens Teutonica habitavit." Anonymi Batavi Idea Ling. [Section III. Saxon. Cædmon's metrical hymn. Alfred's paraphrase or imitation of Boethius.]

III. What was the form of the Saxon language, when about the year 450, they first entered Britain, cannot now be known. They seem to have been a people without learning, and very probably without an alphabet; their speech, therefore, having been always cursory and extemporaneous, must have been artless and unconnected, without any modes of transition or involution of clauses: which abruptness and inconnection may be observed even in their later writings. This barbarity may be supposed to have continued during their wars with the Britains, which for a time left them no leisure for softer studies; nor is there any reason for supposing it abated, till the year 570, when Augustine came from Rome to convert them to Christianity.

[Of the language the earliest monument which remains, is the song or hymn of Cædmon, monk of Whitby; which is now given in the section appropriated to the consideration of the Saxon poetry.]

The Christian religion always implies or produces a certain degree of civility and learning: the Saxons then became by degrees acquainted with the Roman language, and so gained, from time to time, some knowledge and elegance, till in three centuries they had formed a language capable of expressing all the sentiments of a civilized people, as appears by king Alfred's paraphrase or imitation of Boethius and his short preface.

This may perhaps be considered as a specimen of the Saxon (g) in its highest state of purity, for here are scarcely any words borrowed from the Roman dialects.

[Section IV. Version of the Gospels, probably between the time of Alfred and that of the Norman Conquest.]

IV. Of the (h) following version of the Gospels the age is not certainly known; but it was probably written between the time of Alfred and that of the Norman conquest, and therefore may properly be inserted here.

Translations seldom afford just specimens of a language, and least of all those in which a scrupulous and verbal interpretation is endeavoured, because they retain the phraseology and structure of the original tongue; yet they have often this convenience, that the same book, being translated in different ages, affords opportunity of marking the gradations of change, and bringing one age into comparison with another. For this purpose I have placed the Saxon version and that of Wicliffe, written about the year 1380, in opposite columns; because the convenience of easy collation seems greater than that of regular chronology.

[The first four verses of this chapter as they are numbered in our present translation, are, in the manuscripts of Wicliffe, a part of the prologue, and not translated here. See the New Test. by Wicliffe, edited by the Rev. H. H. Baber, 1810, p. 55.]

" IN the dayes of Eroude kyng of Judee ther was a prest Zacarye by name: of the sort of Abia, and his wyf was of the doughtris of Aaron: and hir name was Elizabeth.

" And bothe weren juste bifore God: goynge in alle the maundementis and justifyingis of the Lord withouten playnt.

[Section V. Saxon Poetry.]

V. ["Of the Saxon poetry," Dr. Johnson says, "some specimen is necessary; though our (i) ignorance of the laws of their metre and the quantities of their syllables, which it would be very difficult, perhaps impossible, to recover, excludes us from that pleasure which the old bards undoubtedly gave to their contemporaries.

"The first poetry of the Saxons was without rhyme, and consequently must have depended upon the quantity of their syllables: but they began in time to imitate their neighbours, and close their verses with correspondent sounds."

Alliteration is another distinction of the Saxon poetry; which, as we shall presently see, distinguished also the old English. But rhythm or cadence is its principal feature. "(j) When their words would not fall easily into the desired rhythm, the Saxons were satisfied with an approach to it; and with this mixture of regular and irregular cadence, all their poetry seems to have been composed. By this rhythm, by their inversions of phrase, by their transitions, by their omissions of particles, and above all by their metaphors and perpetual periphrasis, their poetry seems to have been principally distinguished."

Of this poetry the oldest remaining monument is the song or hymn of Cædmon, monk of Whitby, who died in 680; which Alfred inserted in his version of (k) Bede's Ecclesiastical History. The rhythmical division of it, which is now given, is that which the learned historian of the Anglo-Saxons has adopted.

As this fragment is also the oldest monument of the language, a translation of it cannot but be acceptable to the English reader.

"Now should we praise
The Guardian of the heavenly kingdom;
The mighty Creator,
And the conceptions of his mind,
Glorious Father of his works!
As he of every glory,
Eternal Lord!
Established the beginning;
So he first made
The earth for the children of men,
And the heavens for its canopy.
Holy Creator!
The middle region,
The guardian of mankind,
The eternal Lord
Afterwards made,
The earth for men,
Almighty Ruler!"

To this Cædmon has been attributed a beautiful poetical paraphrase of the book of Genesis, and of some other parts of Scripture; which Junius published in 1655. But the appropriation has been questioned; and the (l) composition assigned to a later age.

From the fragment of the true Cædmon, we pass to the notice of another ancient poem, written more than a hundred years before the Norman conquest; a specimen of unadulterated Saxon. It is an Ode on a Victory of king Athelstan's, of the (m) date of 937 or 938. The following is the conclusion of it.

The (n) most interesting remains of the Anglo-Saxon poetry, are said to be a kind of epick poem, in which is described the attempt of Beowulf to wreak the fæhthe or deadly feud on Hrothgar for a homicide, which he had committed. It is supposed to be the oldest poem of an epick form in the vernacular language of Europe which now exists.]

The two following passages, contain apparently the rudiments of our present lyrick measures; and the writers may be justly considered as the genuine ancestors of the English poets.

[Section VI. Dawn of the present English. Saxon Chronicle. Norman Language. Ancient Poetry.]

VI. About the year 1150, the Saxon began to take a form in which the beginning of the present English may be plainly discovered: this change seems not to have been the effect of the Norman conquest, for very few French words are found to have been introduced in the first hundred years after it; the language must therefore have been altered by causes like those which, notwithstanding the care of writers and societies instituted to obviate them, are even now daily making innovations in every living language. I have exhibited a specimen of the language of this age from the year 1135 to 1140 of the Saxon Chronicle, of which the latter part was apparently written near the time to which it relates.

Ðiȝ ȝæȝe ȝoȝ þe kinȝ Stephne oþeȝ ȝæ to Noȝmandi. ȝ þeȝ peȝ undeȝ-ȝanȝen. ȝoȝðí þ hi penden þ he ȝculde ben alȝuic alȝe þe eom peȝ. ȝ ȝoȝ he hadde ȝet hiȝ tȝeȝoȝ. ac he to deld it ȝ ȝcatȝed ȝotlice. Nearly about this time, the following pieces of poetry seem to have been written, of which I have inserted only short fragments; the first is a rude attempt at the present measure, of eight syllables, and the second is a natural introduction to Robert of Gloucester, being composed in the same measure, which, however rude and barbarous it may seem, taught the way to the Alexandrines of the French poetry.

In these fragments, the adulteration of the Saxon tongue, by a mixture of the Norman, becomes apparent; yet it is not so much changed by the admixture of new words which might be imputed to commerce with the continent, as by changes of its own forms and terminations; for which no reason can be given.

[It has been suggested, that these changes in the Saxon, as they consist solely in the extinction of its ancient grammatical inflections, and are similar to the alterations by which the Latin was gradually transformed into the several Romance dialects, may be explained on the same principles. To this it has been acutely objected (s), that when we consider the thousand turns originating in fancy, in some accidental combination, or the absolute ignorance of all rule, on which, in the progress of the darkest times, the modern languages of the greater part of Europe were fortuitously thrown together, rather than deliberately formed, we shall hardly look for steady principles. "(t) Besides, what is singularly remarkable in the early Anglo-Saxon, is, that it ceased to be Saxon by an admixture, as it should seem, with the Norman, without taking from the latter more than a few words, and with no change in its syntax or grammatical construction. It was not so in the Romance dialects, derived from the Latin." Earlier by a few years, than the two preceding poems cited by Dr. Johnson, must be placed the poetical translation made by Layamon, a priest at Ernleye upon Severn, from the Brut d'Angleterre, an ancient French poem by M. Wace. Of this translation the orthography is sometimes perplexing; but it is a most curious monument of the progress of the language in its approach to English. It is (u) supposed to have been made toward the close of the twelfth century; and though substantially an Anglo-Saxon poem, it exhibits the simple style of the Anglo-Norman poetry. It occasionally exhibits an intermixture of rhymes. The following specimen is what precedes Arthur's narration of his dream, which I have minutely copied from the (x) manuscript; observing only the rhythmical division, instead of the prosaick form, in which old Saxon poetry is written.

Þa hit wes dai a marȝen,
And duȝeðe gon sturien.
Arður þa up aras,
And strehte his armes.
he aras up, and adun sat;
Swilc he weore swiðe seoc.
Þa axede him an vair cniht,
Lauerd hu hauest þu iuaren to niht?
Arður þa andswarede,
A mode him wes uneðe.
To niht a mine slepe,
Þer ich lai on bure,
Me imatte a sweuen,
Þeruore ich ful sari am.

That is, according to Mr. Turner's translation:

"Then it was day in the morning,
And the nobles began to stir.
Arthur then rose up,
And stretched his arms.
He arose up, and sat down;
Indeed he was very sick.
Then asked him a true knight,
Lord, how hast thou been to-night?
Arthur then answered,
And his mind was uneasy to him.
To-night in my sleep,
Where I lay on my bed,
I dreamt a dream,
Whereof I am full sorry."

But though the Anglo-Saxon language derived great advantages, in regard to diction, from the writings of the Normans, of which simplicity and plainness is the character; and thus converted wildness and irregularity into order; the Norman tongue was not familiar to the great body of the English people. Before the conquest, indeed, some had begun "(y) in many things to imitate French manners, the great peers to speak French in their houses, in French to write their bills and letters." And after it, towards the close of the eleventh century, some younger (z) monks were directed to learn the Saxon hand, as the letter or character, on account of the Normans, was then neglected, and not known but to a few elders. Yet the (a) common people retained their native speech; and that nearly the ancient idiom was preserved, the style of the Saxon chronicle has shown. Brerewood, noticing the attempt of William the Conqueror to subdue the language as well as the country, pronounces his injunctions, "that French only should be taught in the schools here; and that all the laws of the land should be written, and all the pleadings performed, in that language;" as wholly unavailing to accomplish his design. "For the English being far more numerous than the Normans, the effect and result of all his labours was only that a few French words were mixed with the English. Such was the success of the Franks among the Gauls, and of the Goths among the Italians and Spaniards." The Norman of the period, when William planned his secondary conquest, may be here cited: it is as follows, in his Laws.

Edward the third enacted, as it is recorded in this old French, a law for the restauration of the language which had been disused in legal proceedings; assigning, as the reason of the statute, that, in foreign countries, justice was always observed to be best done, where their laws were studied and practised in their own language. The statute is too curious to be here omitted.

fended, answered, debated, and judged in the English tongue, and that they be entered and inrolled in Latin; and that the laws and customs of the same realm, terms, and processes, be holden and kept as they be and have been before this time; and that by the ancient terms and forms of the declarations no man be prejudiced, so that the matter of the action be fully showed in the declaration and in the writ. And it is accorded by the assent aforesaid, that this ordinance and statute of pleading begin and hold place at the fifteenth of St. Hilary next coming.

The most ancient English song now extant is preserved in a manuscript in the (b) British Museum, and is (c) believed to have been written at least as early as the year 1250. By (d) Sir John Hawkins and Dr. Burney, in their respective histories of musick, it has been most inaccurately referred to the fifteenth century. And their erroneous judgement has been hastily adopted by the historian of English poetry. The song, as (e) Ritson has well observed, will speak for itself. It is in praise of the cuckoo.

" Sumer is icumen in;
Lhude sing cuccu:
Groweþ sed, & bloweþ med,
And springþ þe wde nu.
Sing cuccu.
Awe bleteþ after lomb;
Lhouþ after calue cu;
Bulluc sterteþ,
Bucke verteþ;
Murie sing cuccu.
Cuccu, cuccu,
Wel singes þu cuccu;
Ne swik þu nauer nu."

In modern English thus: "Summer is come in; loud sings the cuckoo: now the seed grows, and the mead blows, (i. e. is in flower,) and the wood springs. The cuckoo sings. The ewe bleats after the lamb; the calf lows after the cow; the bullock starts, the buck verts, (i. e. goes to harbour in the fern;) merrily sings the cuckoo. Cuckoo, cuckoo, well singest thou cuckoo; mayest thou never cease."]

[Section VII. Robert of Gloucester.]

VII. ["Hitherto the language used in this island," Dr. Johnson says, "however different in successive time, may be called Saxon; nor can it be expected, from the nature of things gradually changing, that any time can be assigned, when the Saxon may be said to cease, and the English to commence. Robert of Gloucester, however, who is placed by the criticks in the thirteenth century, seems to have used a kind of intermediate diction, neither Saxon nor English; in his work therefore we see the transition exhibited, and, as he is the first of our writers in rhyme, of whom any large work remains, a more extensive quotation is extracted. He writes apparently in the same measure with the foregoing author of St. Margaret; which, polished into greater exactness, appeared to our ancestors so suitable to the genius of the English language, that it was continued in use almost to the middle of the seventeenth century."

This intermediate diction, however, occurs in the production of Layamon, already cited. And thus the time when the Saxon may be said to cease, and the English to commence, is (f) placed about the year 1180, when the Saxons and Normans, laying aside their antipathies, began to live together in amity, and to participate in a common literature and language; and in 1216 the change is considered as complete. Thus have the Saxon, Danish, and Norman, been mingled together in our present speech; and though nine-tenths of our words were judged, not more than a century since, to be of Saxon origin, perhaps in modern English one-fifth (g) of the Saxon language has ceased to be used.

Of Robert of Gloucester, to whose poetry Dr. Johnson barely adds his name, some information seems requisite. He is supposed by our antiquaries to have been a monk in the abbey of Gloucester. His chronicle was not written till after the year 1278. He might be the "Robert of Gloucester," who was "secretary" to Thomas Cantilupe, bishop of Hereford, at the time of the bishop's decease in 1282; and who is described as "afterwards chancellor of Hereford." See the Life and Gests of S. Thomas Cantilupe, bishop of Hereford, &c. 12mo. Gant, 1674, p. 196. There follows a long description of a curious dream which this "Robert of Gloucester" had, shadowing the death of the bishop. Hearne, however, doubts, that this person was the poet.]

[Very near the time of Robert of Gloucester's poem, we have the following specimen of improved language, in an amatory (h) poem, the metre of which is remarkable, though the lines are printed by Warton like those of Robert of Gloucester.

" Bỳtuene mersh and aueril,
When spraỳ biginneþ to sp[r]inge,
þe lutel foul haþ hire wỳl
On hỳre (i) lud to synge,
Ich libbe in loue longinge
For semlokest of alle þỳnge.
(k) He may me blisse bringe,
Icham in hire bandoun.
An hendỳ hap ichabbe ỳhent:
Ichot from heuene it is me sent.
From alle wỳmmen mi loue is lent,
And lỳht on Alisoun."

That is: " Between March and April, when the spray or branches begin to spring, [and] the little birds have inclination to sing their songs, I live in the longing of love for the seemliest of all things. She may bring me bliss; I am at her command. I have obtained a lucky lot. I wot (believe) it is sent me from heaven. My love has left all other women, and is alighted upon Alysoun."]

[Section VIII. Robert of Brunne. Metrical Romances.]

[The early part of the fourteenth century introduces Robert de Brunne, who is allowed by Warton to have contributed to form a style, to teach expression, and to polish his native tongue, but of whom Dr. Johnson has taken no notice. The poet is said to have been a canon of Brunne, or Bourne, near Depyng in Lincolnshire; whence the name by which he is (l) usually called, his real one being Robert Manyng. His principal work is a translation from the Brut of M. Wace, which exercised, as we have seen, the pen of Layamon; and from the French rhyming chronicle of Peter de Langtoft. This was finished in 1338. But there is also a metrical translation by him of a " Manuel des Peches," or " a Handlynge of Sinne;" the beginning of which states it to have been commenced in 1303.

" (m) Dane Felyp was mayster that tyme,
That y began thys Englysh ryme.
The yere of grace fyl than to be
A thousynd thre hundred and thre."

From this work I copy his praise of good women.

" (n) Nothyng is to man so dere
As womanys love yn gode manere.
A gode woman ys mannys blyss,
Wher her love ryght and stedfast ys.
Ther ys no solace undyr hevene,
Of al that a man may nevene, [name,]
That shuld a man so moche glew, [delight,]
As a gode woman that loveth trew:

(h) [MS. Harl. Lib. No. 2253. The poem is cited, as well as others from the same volume, by Warton and by Ritson; but the latter complains, not without reason, that the extracts made by the former are not always accurate. See Ritson's Ess. on Nat. Song.]

(i) [Lud, lay, song; leudus, low Lat. liod, Icel.]

(k) [Heo, old Sax. is she. See St. Luke i. 29. before cited.]

(l) [His Chronicle is thus described, as " putte into Englishe ryme by Robert de Brune iuxta Depinge." Lambeth MSS. No. 131. This manuscript is imperfect in part, but contains what Hearne omitted to print, and yet remains to be published entire, the translation from the Brut.]

(m) [Warton, Hist of Eng. Poetry, vol. 1. p. 60. Turner, Hist of Eng. vol. 2. p. 446.]

(n) [Turner, ut supr. p. 452.]

Ne derer is none yn Goddys hurde [family]
Than a chaste woman with lovely wurde."

Of his metrical chronicle the following custom, with the subsequent description of the lady who conformed to it, may be a sufficient specimen.

" (o) This es ther custom and ther gest,
Whan thei are atte the ale or fest;
Ilk man that lovis quare him think,
Salle say, wassaille, and to him drink:
He that bidis salle say, wassaille;
The tother salle say again, drinkhaille.
——————— That maidin ying
Wassailed and kist the king:
Of bodi sche was right avenant,
Of fair colour, with swete semblaunt:
Hir hatire fulle wele it semed."

The English compositions, which are called metrical romances, and are chiefly productions of the beginning (p) of the fourteenth century, were now in high estimation; to some of which Robert de Brunne refers. Chaucer, in his Rhime of Sir Topas, has specified many, and in distinctive terms.

" Men speken of romaunces of pris
Of Hornchild, and of Ipotis,
Of Bevis, and Sir Guy:
Of Sir Libeux, and Pleindamour."

These rhyming narratives often present illustrations of manners with great exactness, while they serve in some degree to trace the progress of language. They are said to have been often written or translated at the request, or for the amusement, of the great. From one of those enumerated by Chaucer a brief specimen is cited; which will show, what in other instances in this history may be proved, that our ancient writings are often incorrectly copied. From Sir Libeaus Disconus, (or, as in the twelfth stanza of the romance the name is explained "ly beau desconus, the fayre unknown,") I select a stanza, describing the maiden Ellen, as it stands in an ancient manuscript; and, in the opposite column, place the same as printed in an admired collection of Metrical Romances.

(q) From the MS.	(r) Printed Copy.
" The (s) may hight Ellene,	" That mayde was cleped Elene,
Gentyll, bryght, and shene,	Gentyll, bryght, and schene,
A lovely messengere:	A lady messenger:
Ther nas countes nor quene,	Ther nas countesse ne quene,
So semely on to sene,	So semelych on to sene,
That might be hir pere.	That myght be her pere.
She was clothed in Tarse,	Sche was clodeth with Tars,
Rownd, and nothing scarse," &c.	Rowme, and noding skars," &c.

(o) [Warton, ut supr. p. 70.]

(p) [At the period which gave birth to these fictions, our language was in a state by no means favourable to poetical composition. It had lost not only many of the words and phrases, but much also of the stateliness and uniformity of its parent Saxon; and what had been borrowed from the French, was as yet too scanty and too imperfectly incorporated with the original dialect, to supply the deficiency. Add to this, that our native romancers appear to have been but little solicitous, either as to beauty of style, or correctness and harmony of measure. Rev. J. J. Conybeare, Rom. of Octavian, 1809, p. iv.]

(s) [That is, maid; a pure Saxon word. In an old ballad of the fourteenth century, the author's mistress is called the "fairest may in town." And so Sir T. More and Spenser use it.]

Variations of this kind might be exhibited to a great extent. It is clear, from what is offered, that the manuscript is the most perspicuous.

Scripture history, and the biography of saints, were also the subjects of the metrical romances. From one, unknown to our antiquaries and the lovers of our ancient poetry, I will make a citation. It was probably written in the fourteenth century, and is entitled the "Storie of the lady Asneth, daughter of Putifar, one of the princes of Pharaoh, chief counseilour. &c." and is "translated out of the latyn into Englysh." It is, in fact, a sort of history of Joseph, who at length marries Asneth. The metre of the poem is that which Robert of Gloucester has used. This metrical history forms part of a manuscript which belonged to the conventual college of Bonhommes at Ashridge in Buckinghamshire, and is now in the library of the marquis of Stafford. The description of the heroine, and the desire of Pharaoh's son to marry her, are the passages which I have selected.

"This prince hadde a dowter dere, Asneth was her name,
A virgine ful specious, and semely of stature;
Of eẏhtene yeer age sche was, withoute ony blame, fflorishyng in here beaute the most comely creature
Of Egipt, and alle virgines sche passed in feture;
Not lyke the dowhtres of Egipt in here resemblance,
But assemblyng the Hebrees in color and countenance. —
But when þat Pharaoes eldist child his sone and his heir
Herde telle of this ladi, to his fadir he wente right,
And said graunte me to my wyf Asneth the feyr;
But Pharao denyed hym, and answered to the knyght,
Thu schalt have to þin astate a ladi of more myght,
The kyngis dowter of Moab, of noble alliaunce,
A comeli quene, fair and free, even to þe plesance."

To the lives of the saints in verse I may also add an hitherto unexplored translation, as it is called, of the Golden Legend; of a later date than the romance which I have cited, but not of interesting character as to its poetry or language. It ends with the life of St. Eustas. The running title of Becket, viz. "St. Thomas of Canterbury," is, through the greatest part of his tedious legend, crossed with the pen; as in other manuscripts the same kind of literary degradation has been fixed upon the saintship of this prelate. A circumstance, attending the murder of Becket, may be cited as a specimen of this rhyming compilation; for a compilation it is from other sources as well as the Legenda Aurea.

"Another knẏȝt smote saẏnt Thomas in þat selue wounde,
And made him bowe his face adoun and loke toward þe grounde:
The þridde in þat selue stid þereafter hẏm smote anon,
And made him loute al adoun þe face to þe stone;
In þat stid þe ferþe smote þat þat other hade ere ẏdo,
And þe poẏnt of his swerde brake bi þe merble stone atwo;
ȝett þe poẏnt at Canterbury þe monkes leten wete
ffor honor of þe holẏ mon þat þerwith was ẏsmẏte."

This manuscript is in the archiepiscopal library of Lambeth Palace, No. 223.; and the author is described by Henry Wharton as Robert de Wottoun, of whom, however, no notice occurs in our poetical or biographical histories.]

[Section IX. Richard Rolle. Laurence Minot. Vision of Pierce Ploughman.]

[Towards the middle of the fourteenth century we find a valuable writer both of poetry and prose, in Richard Rolle, of the order of St. Augustine, often called the hermit of Hampole, and simply Richard Hampole. His compositions are numerous. From his translation of the Psalms, in which, he says, "I seke no straunge Ynglys, bot lightest and communest," as also from his "Twelve Profits of Tribulation," the specimens of his prose are taken; and from his long poem, entitled (t) "The Prikke of Conscience," expressly written for those who could understand only English, that of his poetry.

(u) From Psalm xxiii.

"Our Lord gouerneth me, and nothyng to me shal wante: stede of pasture thar he me sette. In the water of the hetyng forth he me brougte: my soul he turnyde.

"He ladde me on the stretis of rygtwisnesse for his name.

"For win gif I hadde goo in myddil of the shadewe of deeth, I shal not dreede yveles; for thou art with me.

"Thi geerde and thi stef, thei haue coumfortid me."

(v) From the Twelve Profits of Tribulation.

"The sevynth profet of tribulacion is, that it spredith abred or opynyth thyne hert to receyve the grace of God. For God, with many strokys of the hammyr, spredith abrode a pece of golde or of silver, to make a vessell for to put in wyne or precyouse liquore. — And considre, as the more preciouse metalle is more ductible and obeynge to the strokes of the goldsmyth; so the more preciouse and meke herte is more paciente in tribulacion. And allethogh the sharp stroke of tribulacion turmenteth the, yet comforte the; for the goldsmyth, Alle-myghty God, holdeth the hammer of tribulacion in his hond, and knoweth ful welle what thou maiste suffir, and mesurith hys smytynge after thi frele nature."

The following versification and description of the poet's heaven are certainly pleasing.

"Ther is lyf withoute ony deth,
And ther is youthe without ony elde;
And ther is alle manner welthe to welde:
And ther is reste without ony travaille: —
And ther is pees withoute ony strife,
And ther is alle mannere likynge of lyf: —
And ther is bright somer ever to se,
And ther is nevere wynter in that countree: —
And ther is more worshipe and honour,
Then evere hadde kynge other emperour.
And there is grete melodee of aungeles' songe,
And ther is preysing hem amonge.
And ther is alle maner frendshipe that may be,
And ther is evere perfect love and charite;
And ther is wisdom without folye,
And ther is honeste without vilenye.
All these a man may joyes of hevene call:
Ac yutte the most sovereyn joy of alle,
Is the sight of Goddes bright face,
In wham resteth alle manere grace."

(t) [A very full and interesting account of this poem, with numerous extracts, is given by J. B. Yates, Esq. in the Archæologia, vol. 19. p. 314, et seq.]

(u) [MS. Brit. Mus. cited by the Rev. H. H. Baber, Life of Wiclif, &c. p. lxvii. "The Abbay of the Holy Ghost," another composition of Rolle, appears to have been unknown to our antiquaries. It is among the Lambeth MSS. No. 432. 2.]

(v) [MS. cited by Turner, Hist. of Eng. vol. 2. p. 578.]

(w) [MS. cited by Turner, ut supr. p. 462. There are three copies of this curious poem among the Lambeth MSS. Two of them are very valuable, and afford variations of consequence, viz. No 491. fol. 296. and No. 492. The third is the fourth article in No. 260.]

About the middle also of the fourteenth century, Laurence Minot wrote, for the most part in lyrick measure, some short poems on events in the reign of our third Edward. They were published by Mr. Ritson, in 1795. From the first of them a stanza may be selected.

"Trew king, that sittes in trone,
Unto the I tel my tale,
And unto the I bid a bone,
For thou art bone of al my bale:
Als thou made midel erd, and the mone,
And bestes and fowles grete and smale:
Unto me send thi socoure sone,
And dresce my dedes in this dale."

Not only smoothness of versification may be here observed, but also, what is found in the ancient Saxon poetry, studied alliteration. But in no composition can this latter practice be better illustrated than in the vision of Pierce Ploughman, a poem without rhyme, written also not long after the middle of the fourteenth century, and ascribed to (x) Robert Langland, a secular priest, and fellow of Oriel College in Oxford. It is to the learned printer of the work that we owe this information, at the distance of about a century afterwards. He tells us, that the author "wrote altogyther in miter, [metre,] but not after the maner of our rimers that write nowe a dayes; for his verses ende not alike; but the nature of hys miter is, to have thre wordes at the leaste in every verse whiche beginne with some one letter: as for ensample, the firste two verses of the boke renne upon s; as thus:

In a somer season, whan sette was the sunne,
I shope me into shrobbes, as I a shepe were, &c.

The thinge noted, the miter shal be very pleasaunt to read." The Printer to the Reader. In this composition there is often very animated description amid severe satire. I have selected a serious passage in which the birth and death of our Lord are the objects of the writer's notice; in which there is strength of colouring, and ample exhibition of the alliterative metre.

"(y) There blased a starre,
That al the wise men of this world in one accorden,
That such a barne was borne in Bethlems city,
That mans soule shoulde save, and synne destroy.
And al the elementes, saith the boke, hereof bereth witnes,
That he was God that al wrought: the welken first shewed
Tho ther were in heaven tooken, stella comata,
And tindeden hir as a torche, to reverence his byrth:
The light folowed the Lorde into the lowe earth:
The water witnessed that he was God: for he went on it.—
And lo how the sunne gan lacke her light in her selfe,

The earth, for hevines that He woulde suffer,

[Section X. Sir John Mandeville. Wicliffe. Trevisa. Public documents.]

Sir John Mandeville wrote, as he himself informs us, in the fourteenth century, and his work, which, comprising a relation of many different particulars, consequently required the use of many words and phrases, may be properly specified in this place. Of the following quotations, I have chosen the first, because it shows, in some measure, the state of European science as well as of the English tongue; and the second, because it is valuable for the force of thought and beauty of expression.

(x) [By Robert Crowley, who published the work in 1550, and prefixed an introduction to it. Crowley was fellow of Magdalen College in Oxford; was afterwards an ecclesiastick, and was well beneficed.]

I. " In that lond, ne in many othere (z) bezonde that, no man may see the sterre transmontane, that is clept the sterre of the see, that is unmevable, and that is toward the Northe, that we clepen the lode sterre. But men seen another sterre, the contrarie to him, that is toward the Southe, that is clept Antartyk. And right as the schip men taken here avys here, and governe hem be the lode sterre, right so don schip men bezonde the parties, be the sterre of the Southe, the which sterre apperethe not to us. And this sterre, that is toward the Northe, that wee clepen the lode sterre, ne apperethe not to hem. For whiche cause, men may wel perceyve that the lond and the see ben of rownde schapp and forme. For the partie of the firmament schewethe in o contree, that schewethe not in another contree. And men may well preven be experience and sotyle compassement of wytt, that zif a man fond passages be schippes, that wolde go to serchen the world, men myghte go be schippe alle aboute the world, and aboven and benethen. The whiche thing I prove thus, aftre that I have seyn. For I have been toward the parties of Braban, and beholden the Astrolabre, that the sterre that is clept the transmontayne, is 53 degrees highe. And more forthere in Almayne and Bewme, it hathe 58 degrees. And more forthe toward the parties septemtrioneles, it is 62 degrees of heghte, and certyn mynutes. For I my self have mesured it by the Astrolabre. Now schulle ze knowe, that azen the Transmontayne, is the tother sterre, that is clept Antartyke ; as I have seyd before. And tho 2 sterres ne meeven nevere. And be hem turnethe alle the firmament, righte as dothe a wheel, that turnethe be his axille tree : so that tho sterres beren the firmament in 2 egalle parties ; so that it hathe als mochel aboven, as it hathe benethen. Aftre this, I have gon toward the parties meridionales, that is toward the Southe : and I have founden, that in Lybye, men seen first the sterre Antartyk. And so fer I have gon more in tho contrees, that I have founde that sterre more highe ; so that towarde the highe Lybye, it is 18 degrees of heghte, and certeyn minutes (of the whiche, 60 minutes maken a degree) aftre goynge be see and be londe, toward this contree, of that I have spoke, and to other yles and londes bezonde that contree, I have founden the sterre Antartyk of 33 degrees of heghte, and mo mynutes. And zif I hadde had companye and schippynge, for to go more bezonde, I trowe wel in certyn, that wee scholde have seen alle the roundnesse of the firmament alle aboute. For as I have seyd zou be forn, the half of the firmament is betwene tho 2 sterres : the whiche halfondelle I have seyn. And of the tother halfondelle, I have seyn toward the Northe, undre the Transmontane 62 degrees and 10 mynutes ; and toward the partie meridionale, I have seen undre the Antartyk 33 degrees and 16 mynutes : and thanne the halfondelle of the firmament in alle, ne holdethe not but 180 degrees. And of tho 180, I have seen 62 on that o part, and 33 on that other part, that ben 95 degrees, and nyghe the halfondelle of a degree ; and so there ne faylethe but that I have seen alle the firmament, saf 84 degrees and the halfondelle of a degree ; and that is not the fourthe part of the firmament. For the 4 partie of the roundnesse of the firmament holt 90 degrees : so there faylethe but 5 degrees and an half, of the fourthe partie. And also I have seen the 3 parties of alle the roundnesse of the firmament, and more zit 5 degrees and an half. Be the whiche I seye zou certeynly, that men may envirowne alle the erthe of alle the world, as wel under as aboven, and turnen azen to his contree, that hadde companye and schippynge and conduyt : and alle weyes he scholde fynde men, londes, and yles, als wel as in this contree. For zee wyten welle, that thei that ben toward the Antartyk, thei ben streghte, feet azen feet of hem, that dwellen undre the transmontane ; als wel as wee and thei that dwellyn undre us, ben feet azenst feet. For alle the parties of see and of lond han here appositees, habitables or trepassables, and thei of this half and bezond half. And wytethe wel, that aftre that, that I may parceyve and comprehende, the londes of Prestre John, emperour of Ynde ben undre us. For in goynge from Scotlond or from Englond toward Jerusalem, men gon upward alweys. For oure lond is in the lowe partie of the erthe, toward the West : and the lond of Prestre John is the low partie of the erthe, toward the Est : and thei han there the day, whan wee have the nyghte, and also highe to the contrarie, thei han the nyghte, whan we han the day. For the erthe and the see ben of round forme and schapp, as I have seyd beforn. And than that men gon upward to o cost, men gon dounward to another cost. Also zee have herd me seye, that Jerusalem is in the myddes

of the world; and that may men preven and schewen there, be a spere, that is pighte in to the erthe, upon the hour of mydday, whan it is equenoxium, that schewethe no schadwe on no syde. And that it scholde ben in the myddes of the world, David wytnessethe it in the Psautre, where he seythe, Deus operatus est salutē in medio terre. Thanne thei that parten fro the parties of the West, for to go toward Jerusalem, als many iorneyes as thei gon upward for to go thidre, in als many iorneyes may thei gon fro Jerusalem, unto other confynyes of the superficialtie of the erthe bezonde. And whan men gon bezonde tho iorneyes, towarde Ynde and to the foreyn yles, alle is envyronynge the roundnesse of the erthe and of the see, undre oure countrees on this half. And therfore hathe it befallen many tymes of o thing, that I have herd cownted, whan I was zong; how a worthi man departed sometyme from our contrees, for to go serche the world. And so he passed Ynde, and the yles bezonde Ynde, where ben mo than 5000 yles: and so longe he wente be see and lond, and so enviround the world be many seysons, that he fond an yle, where he herde speke his owne langage, callynge on oxen in the plowghe, suche wordes as men speken to bestes in his owne contree: whereof he hadde gret mervayle: for he knewe not how it mighte be. But I seye, that he had gon so longe, be londe and be see, that he had envyround alle the erthe, that he was comen azen envirounynge, that is to seye, goynge aboute, unto his owne marches, zif he wolde have passed forthe, til he had founden his contree and his owne knouleche. But he turned azen from thens, from whens he was come fro; and so he loste moche peynefulle labour, as him self seyde, a gret while aftre, that he was comen hom. For it befelle aftre, that he wente in to Norweye; and there tempest of the see toke him; and he arryved in an yle; and whan he was in that yle, he knew wel, that it was the yle, where he had herd speke his owne langage before, and the callynge of the oxen at the plowghe: and that was possible thinge. But how it semethe to symple men unlerned, that men ne mowe not go undre the erthe, and also that men scholde falle toward the hevene, from undre! But that may not be, upon lesse, than wee mowe falle toward hevene, fro the erthe, where wee ben. For fro what partie of the erthe, that men duelle, outher aboven or benethen, it semethe alweyes to hem that duellen, that thei gon more righte than ony other folk. And righte as it semethe to us, that thei ben undre us, righte so it semethe hem, that wee ben undre hem. For zif a man mighte falle fro the erthe unto the firmament; be grettere resoun, the erthe and the see, that ben so grete and so hevy, scholde fallen to the firmament: but that may not be: and therfore seithe oure Lord God, Non timeas me, qui suspendi terrā ex nichilo? And alle be it, that it be possible thing, that men may so envyronne all the world, natheles of a 1000 persones, on ne myghte not happen to returnen in to his contree. For, for the gretnesse of the erthe and of the see, men may go be a 1000 and a 1000 other weyes, that no man cowde redye him perfitely toward the parties that he cam fro, but zif it were be aventure and happ, or be the grace of God. For the erthe is fulle large and fulle gret, and holt in roundnesse and about envyroun, be aboven and benethen 20425 myles, aftre the opynyoun of the olde wise astronomeres. And here seyenges I repreve noughte. But aftre my lytylle wyt, it semethe me, savynge here reverence, that it is more. And for to have bettere understondynge, I seye thus, be ther ymagyned a figure, that hathe a gret compas; and aboute the poynt of the gret compas, that is clept the centre, be made another litille compas: than aftre, be the gret compass devised be lines in manye parties; and that alle the lynes meeten at the centre; so that in als manye parties, as the grete compas schal be departed, in als manye, schalle be departed the litille, that is aboute the centre, alle be it, that the spaces ben lesse. Now thanne, be the gret compas represented for the firmament, and the litille compas represented for the erthe. Now thanne the firmament is devysed, be astronomeres, in 12 signes; and every signe is devysed in 30 degrees, that is 360 degrees, that the firmamente hath aboven. Also, be the erthe devysed in als manye parties, as the firmament; and lat every partye answere to a degree of the firmament; and wytethe it wel, that aftre the auctoures of astronomye, 700 furlonges of erthe answeren to a degree of the firmament; and tho ben 87 miles and 4 furlonges. Now be that here multiplyed be 360 sithes; and than thei ben 31500 myles, every of 8 furlonges, aftre myles of oure contree. So moche hathe the erthe in roundnesse, and of heghte enviroun, aftre myn opynyoun and myn undirstondynge. And zee schulle undirstonde, that aftre the opynyoun of olde wise philosophres and astronomeres, oure contree ne Irelond ne Wales ne Scotlond ne Norweye ne the other yles costynge to hem, ne ben not in the superficyalte cownted aboven the erthe; as it schewethe be alle the bokes of astronomye.

For the superficialtee of the erthe is departed in 7 parties, for the 7 planetes: and tho parties ben clept clymates. And oure parties be not of the 7 clymates: for thei ben descendynge toward the West. And also these yles of Ynde, which beth evene azenst us, beth noght reckned in the climates: for thei ben azenst us, that ben in the lowe contree. And the 7 clymates strecchen hem envyrounynge the world.

II. " And I John Maundevylle knyghte aboveseyd, (alle thoughe I be unworthi) that departed from oure contrees and passed the see, the zeer of grace 1322. that have passed manye londes and manye yles and contrees, and cerched manye fulle straunge places, and have ben in many a fulle gode honourable companye, and at many a faire dede of armes, (alle be it that I dide none myself, for myn unable insuffisance) now I am comen hom (mawgree my self) to reste: for gowtes, artetykes, that me distreynen, tho diffynen the ende of my labour, azenst my wille (God knowethe.) And thus takynge solace in my wrecched reste, recordynge the tyme passed, I have fulfilled theise thinges and putte hem wryten in this boke, as it wolde come in to my mynde, the zeer of grace 1356 in the 34 zeere that I departede from oure contrees. Wherfore I preye to alle the rederes and hereres of this boke, zif it plese hem, that thei wolde preyen to God for me: and I schalle preye for hem. And alle tho that seyn for me a Pater noster, with an Ave Maria, that God forzeve me my synnes, I make hem partneres and graunte hem part of alle the gode pilgrimages and of alle the gode dedes, that I have don, zif ony be to his plesance: and noghte only of tho, but of alle that evere I schalle do unto my lyfes ende. And I beseche Almyghty God, fro whom alle godenesse and grace comethe fro, that he vouchesaf, of his excellent mercy and habundant grace, to fulle fylle hire soules with inspiracioun of the Holy Gost, in makynge defence of alle hire gostly enemyes here in erthe, to hire salvacioun, bothe of body and soule; to worschipe and thankynge of him, that is three and on, withouten begynnynge and withouten endynge; that is withouten qualitee, good, and withouten quantytee, gret; that in alle places is present, and alle thinges contenynynge; the whiche that no goodnesse may amende, ne non evelle empeyre; that in perfeyte trynytee lyvethe and regnethe God, be all worldes and be alle tymes. Amen, Amen, Amen."

" Freres praisen more their rotten habite then the worshipfull body of our Lord Jesu Christ; for they techen lords and nameliche ladies, that if they dien in Francis's habite, they shulden never come to hell for virtue thereof.

" Also Freres beggen without nede for their own rich sect.

" Freres also keepen not correption of the Gospel against their brethren that trespassen, but cruelly don them to painful prison."

Wicliffe died in 1384.

Contemporary with him was John de Trevisa, Vicar of Berkeley in Gloucestershire; who translated the Polychronicon of Higden, and Bartholomæus de Proprietatibus Rerum; and has had the reputation of having produced an English version of the Bible, which however has in vain been sought for. From the version of Higden, partly made in 1385, the following extracts are highly interesting; both as they respect the language and custom of the time.

" (a) As it is know how many maner peple beth in this Ilonde, ther beth also of so meny peple langages and tonges. Notheless Walschemen and Scottes, that beth nouȝt ymedled with othir natiouns, holdeth wel neig her first langage and speche. But yett the Scottes, that were somtyme confederate and woned with the Pictes, drawe somewhat after her speche. But the Flemmynges, that woneth in the west side of Wales, haveth ylefte her straunge speche, and speketh Saxonlich enouȝ. Also Englischemen, thouȝ they had from the beginnyng thre maner speche, southren, northren, and myddell speche in the myddell of the lond, as thei come of the thre maner peple of Germania; notheles by commixtion, and medlyng, first with Danes, and afterward with Normans, in many the contray langage is appaired. For some usith strang wlaffynge, chitering, harryng and garryng, grisbyting. This apairynge of the birthe tonge is bicause of twey thinges: oon is, for children in scole agens the usage and maner of alle other natiouns beth compellid for to leve her owne langage, and for to constrewe her lessons and her things a Frensche, and haveth siththe that the Normans came first in to Englond. Also gentil mens children beth ytaught for to speke Frensche from the time that thei beth rokked in her cradel, and kunneth speke and play with a childes brooche. And uplondische men woll likne hem self to gentilmen, and fondith with grete bysinesse for to speke Frensche for to be the more ytold of."

(a) [MS. Harl. 1900. Brit. Mus. Part of the citation, which I have made, is given by several of our antiquaries, not without some verbal variations. But the whole passage has been printed by Caxton, in which are many differences and evident mistakes.]

So far is a translation from Higden: Trevisa then adds his own observation.

"This maner was miche yused tofore the first moreyn, and is siththe somdel ychaungide. For Johan Cornwail, a maister of gramer, chaungide the lore of gramer scole and construction of Frensche in to Englisch; and Richard Pencriche lerned that maner techyng of hym; and othir men of Pencrich; so that now in the yere of our Lord M. CCC. LXXXV. of the secund king Richard after the Conquest nyne, in alle the gramer scoles of Englond, children leveth Frensche, and construeth and lerneth an Englisch, and haveth thereby avantage in oon side, and desavantage in another. Her avauntage is that thei lerneth her gramer in lasse time than children were wont to do: desavauntage is, that now children of gramer scole kunneth no more Frensche, then can her lifte heele. And it is harm for hem and thei schul passe the see, and travaile in straunge londes and in many other places also. Also gentel men haveth now myche ylefte for to teche her children Frensche."

The translation is then resumed: —

"Hit semeth a grete wonder, how Englisch, that is the birthe tonge of Englischmen, and her owne langage and tonges, is so dyverse of soun in this oon Ilond."

Trevisa dates the conclusion of his translation in 1387. Tanner says that he died, very old, in 1412.

Ritson mentions an indenture of 1343, as the oldest English instrument known. Tyrwhitt had discovered no instance of the English language in parliamentary proceedings earlier than 1398. Ritson, however, refers to one of 1388.]

[Section XI. Gower. Chaucer. John the Chaplain. Thomas Hoccleve, or Occleve. Lydgate.]

The first of our authors, who can properly be said to have written English, was Sir John Gower, who, in his Confession of a Lover, calls Chaucer his disciple, and may therefore be considered as the father of our poetry.

[Dr. Johnson is mistaken in saying that Gower calls Chaucer his disciple; for (b) it is Venus, whom Gower describes, at the close of his Confessio Amantis, claiming Chaucer as her scholar and bard. That Gower is to be placed before Chaucer is unquestionable. He was born before Chaucer. Authors both historical and poetical, in the century after the decease of these poets, usually coupling their names and describing their accomplishments, place Gower before Chaucer; not intending precedence in respect to talents, but merely to seniority. John Fox observes, that "he (Chaucer) and Gower were both of one time; although it seemeth that Gower was a great deal his ancient."]

"Nowe for to speke of the commune,
It is to drede of that fortune,
Which hath befalle in sondrye londes:
But ofte for defaute of bondes
All sodeinly, er it be wist,
A tunne, whan his lie arist
Tobreketh, and renneth all aboute,
Whiche els shulde nought gone out.
"And eke full ofte a littell skare
Vpon a banke, er men be ware,
Let in the streme, whiche with gret peine,
If any man it shall restreine.
Where lawe failleth, errour groweth.
He is not wise, who that ne troweth.
For it hath proued oft er this.
And thus the common clamour is
In euery londe, where people dwelleth:
And eche in his complainte telleth,
How that the worlde is miswent,
And thervpon his jugement
Yeueth euery man in sondrie wise:
But what man wolde him selfe auise
His conscience, and nought misuse,
He maie well at the first excuse
His god, whiche euer stant in one,
In him there is defaute none
So must it stande vpon vs selue.
Nought only vpon ten ne twelue,
But plenarly vpon vs all.
For man is cause of that shall fall."

(b) [Illustr. of Gower and Chaucer, 1810, p. xxxiii.]

[It would be unjust to the father of English poetry, as Dr. Johnson calls him, to exemplify his art only in the preceding dry citation. I therefore add a specimen of his fancy in describing the feelings of a lover; in which, as I have elsewhere observed, he approaches the tender gallantry of Petrarch; and to which the description of Milton's musick, that "takes the prison'd soul and laps it in Elysium," is akin.

"As the windes of the South
Ben most of alle debonaire;
So, whan hir liste to speke faire,
The vertue of hir goodly speche
Is verily myn hertes leche.
And if it so befalle among,
That she carol upon a song,
Whan I it hear, I am so fedd,
That I am fro miself so ledd
As though I were in Paradis:
For certes, as to myn avis,
Whan I heare of her voice the steven,
Me thinketh it is a blisse of heven."]

The history of our language is now brought to the point at which the history of our poetry is generally supposed to commence, the time of the illustrious Geoffry Chaucer, who may perhaps, with great justice, be stiled the first of our versifyers who wrote poetically. He does not however appear to have deserved all the praise which he has received, or all the censure that he has suffered. Dryden, who, mistaking genius for learning, in confidence of his abilities, ventured to write of what he had not examined, ascribes to Chaucer the first refinement of our numbers, the first production of easy and natural rhymes, and the improvement of our language, by words borrowed from the more polished languages of the continent. Skinner contrarily blames him in harsh terms for having vitiated his native speech by whole cartloads of foreign words. But he that reads the works of Gower will find smooth numbers and easy rhymes, of which Chaucer is supposed to have been the inventor, and the French words, whether good or bad, of which Chaucer is charged as the importer. Some innovations he might probably make, like others, in the infancy of our poetry, which the paucity of books does not allow us to discover with particular exactness; but the works of Gower and Lydgate sufficiently evince, that his diction was in general like that of his contemporaries: and some improvements he undoubtedly made by the various dispositions of his rhymes, and by the mixture of different numbers, in which he seems to have been happy and judicious. I have selected several specimens both of his prose and verse; and among them, part of his translation of Boethius, to which another version, made in the time of queen Mary, is opposed. It would be improper to quote very sparingly an author of so much reputation, or to make very large extracts from a book so generally known.

"Alas! I wepyng am constrained to begin verse of sorrowfull matter, that whilom in florishyng studie made delitable ditees. Heres hore aren shad overtimeliche upon my hed: and the slacke skinne trembleth of mine empted bodie. Thilke deth of men is welefull, that he ne cometh not in yeres that be swete, but cometh to wretches often icleped: Alas, alas! with how defe an ere deth cruell turneth awaie fro wretches, and naieth for to close wepyng eyen. "I that in tyme of prosperite, and floryshing studye, made pleasaunte and delectable dities, or verses: alas now beyng heauy and sad ouerthrowen in aduersitie, am compelled to fele and tast heuiness and greif. Beholde the muses Poeticall, that is to saye: the pleasure that is in poetes verses, do appoynt me, and compel me to writ these verses in meter, and the sorowfull verses do wet my wretched face with very waterye teares, yssuinge out of my eyes for sorowe. Whiche muses no feare without doute could ouercome, but that they wold folow me in my iourney of exile or banishment. Sometyme the ioye of happy and lusty delectable youth dyd comfort me, and nowe the course of sorowfull olde age causeth me to reioyse. For hasty old age vnloked for is come vpon me with al her incommodities and euyls, and sorow hath commaunded and broughte me into the same old age, that is to say: that sorowe causeth me to faithfull favoured me with light godes, that sorowfull houre, that is to saie, the deth, had almoste drente myne hedde: but now for fortune cloudie hath chaunged her decevable chere to mewarde, myne unpitous life draweth along ungreable dwellynges. O ye my frendes, what, or whereto avaunted ye me to ben welfull? For he that hath fallin, stode in no stedfast degre.

"In the mene while, that I still record these thynges with my self, and marked my wepelie complainte with office of poinctell: I saugh stondyng aboven the hight of myn hed a woman of full grete reverence, by semblaunt. Her eyen brennyng, and clere, seyng over the common might of menne, with a lively colour, and with soche vigour and strength that it ne might not be nempned, all were it so, that she were full of so grete age, that menne woulden not trowen in no manere, that she were of our elde.

"The stature of her was of doutous Judgemente, for sometyme she constrained and shronke her selven, like to the common mesure of menne: And sometyme it semed, that she touched the heven with the hight of her hedde. And when she hove her hedde higher, she perced the self heven, so that the sight of menne lokyng was in ydell: her clothes were maked of right delie thredes, and subtel craft of perdurable matter. The whiche clothes she had woven with her owne handes, as I knewe well after by her self declaryng, and shewyng to me the beautie: The whiche clothes a darknesse of a forleten and dispised elde had dusked and darked, as it is wonte to darke by smoked Images.

"In the netherest hemme and border of these clothes menne redde iwoven therein a Grekishe A. that signifieth the life active, and above that letter, in the hiest bordure, a Grekishe C. that signifieth the life contemplatife. And betwene these two letters there were seen degrees nobly wrought, in maner of ladders, by whiche degrees menne might climben from the netherest letter to the upperest: nathelesse handes of some men hadden kerve that clothe, by violence or by strength, and everiche manne of 'hem had borne awaie soche peces, as he might getten. And forsothe this forsaied woman bare smale bokes in her right hande, and in her left hand she bare a scepter. And when she sawe these Poeticall muses approchying about my bed, and endityng wordes to my wepynges, she was a little amoved, and glowed with cruell eyen. Who (q'ð she) hath suffered approachen to this ske manne these commen strompettes, of which be olde, before my time come of olde age. The hoer heares do growe vntimely vpon my heade, and my reuiled skynne trembleth my flesh, cleane consumed and wasted with sorowe. Mannes death is happy, that cometh not in youth, when a man is lustye, and in pleasure or welth: but in time of aduersitie, when it is often desyred. Alas Alas howe dull and deffe be the eares of cruel death, &c.

"Whyles that I considerydde pryuylye with my selfe the thynges before sayd, and descrybed wy wofull complaynte after the maner and offyce of a wrytter, me thought I sawe a woman stand ouer my head of a reuerend countenaunce, hauyng quycke and glysteryng clere eyes, aboue the common sorte of men in lyuely and delectable coloure, and ful of strength, although she semed so olde that by no meanes she is thought to be one of this oure tyme, her stature is of douteful knowledge, for nowe she shewethe herselfe at the commen length or statur of men, and other whiles she semeth so high, as though she touched heuen with the crown of her hed. And when she wold stretch fourth her hed hygher, it also perced thorough heauen, so that mens syghte coulde not attaine to behold her. Her vestures or cloths were perfeyt of the finyste thredes, and subtyll workemanshyp, and of substaunce permanent, whych vesturs she had wouen with her own hands as I perceyued after by her own saiynge. The kynde or beawtye of the whyche vestures, a certayne darkenes or rather ignoraunce of oldenes forgotten hadde obscuryd and darkened, as the smoke is wont to darken Images that stand nyghe the smoke. In the lower parte of the said vestures was read the Greke letter P. wouen whych signifyeth practise or actyffe, and in the hygher part of the vestures the Greke letter T. which estandeth for theorica, that signifyeth speculacion or contemplation. And betwene both the sayd letters were sene certayne degrees, wrought after the maner of ladders, wherein was as it were a passage or waye in steppes or degrees from the lower part wher the letter P. was which is vnderstand from practys or actyf, unto the hygher parte wher the letter T. was whych is vnderstand speculacion or contemplacion. Neuertheles the handes of some vyolente persones had cut the sayde vestures and had taken awaye certayne pecis thereof, such as euery one coulde catch. And she her selfe dyd bare in her ryght hand litel bokes, and in her lefte hande a sceptre, which forsayd phylosophy (when she saw the muses poetycal present at my bed, spek-

is the place that menne callen Theatre, the whiche onely ne asswagen not his sorowes with remedies, but thei would feden and norishe hym with swete venime? Forsothe that ben tho that with thornes, and prickynges of talentes of affeccions, whiche that ben nothyng fructuous nor profitable, distroien the Corne, plentuous of fruictes of reson. For thei holden hertes of men in usage, but thei ne deliver no folke fro maladie. But if ye muses had withdrawen fro me with your flatteries any unconnyng and unprofitable manne, as ben wont to finde commenly emong the peple, I would well suffre the lasse grevously. For why, in soche an unprofitable man myne ententes were nothyng endamaged. But ye withdrowen fro me this man, that hath ben nourished in my studies or scoles of Eleaticis, and of Academicis in Grece. But goeth now rather awaie ye Mermaidens, whiche that ben swete, till it be at the last, and suffreth this man to be cured and heled by my muses, that is to say, by my notefull sciences. And thus this companie of muses iblamed casten wrothly the chere dounward to the yerth, and shewing by rednesse ther shame, thei passeden sorowfully the thresholde. And I of whom the sight plounged in teres was darked, so that I ne might not know what that woman was, of so Imperial aucthoritie, I woxe all abashed and stonied, and cast my sight doune to the yerth, and began still for to abide what she would doen afterward. Then came she nere, and set her doune upon the utterest corner of my bed, and she beholdyng my chere, that was cast to the yerth, hevie and grevous of wepyng, complained with these wordes (that I shall saine) the perturbacion of my thought."

yng sorrowful wordes to my wepynges) beyng angry sayd (with terrible or frownynge countenaunce) who suffred these crafty harlottes to com to thys sycke man? whych can help hym by no means of hys griefe by any kind of medicines, but rather increase the same with swete poyson. These be they that doo destroye the fertile and plentious commodytyes of reason and the fruytes therof wyth their pryckynge thornes, or barren affectes and accustome or subdue mens myndes with sickenes, and heuynes, and do not delyuer or heale them of the same. But yf your flatterye had conueyed or withdrawen from me, any vnlernyd man as the comen sorte of people are wonte to be, I coulde haue ben better contentyd, for in that my worke should not be hurt or hynderyd. But you haue taken and conueyed from me thys man that hath ben broughte vp in the studyes of Aristotel and of Plato. But yet get you hence maremaids (that seme swete untyll you haue brought a man to deathe) and suffer me to heale thys my man wyth my muses or scyences that be holsome and good. And after that philosophy had spoken these wordes the sayd companye of the musys poeticall beynge rebukyd and sad, caste down their countenaunce to the grounde, and by blussyng confessed their shamfastnes, and went out of the dores. But I (that had my sight dull and blynd wyth wepyng, so that I knew not what woman this was hauing soo great aucthoritie) was amasyd or astonyed, and lokyng downeward, towarde the grounde, I began pryvylye to look what thyng she would saye ferther, then she had said. Then she approching and drawynge nere vnto me, sat downe vpon the vttermost part of my bed, &c."

The Conclusions of the Astrolabie.

"This book (written to his son in the year of our Lord 1391, and in the 14 of King Richard II.) standeth so good at this day, especially for the horizon of Oxford, as in the opinion of the learned it cannot be amended, says an Edit. of Chaucer."

"Lytel Lowys my sonne, I perceve well by certaine evidences thyne abylyte to lerne scyences, touching nombres and proporcions, and also well consydre I thy besye prayer in especyal to lerne the tretyse of the astrolabye. Than for as moche as a philosopher saithe, he wrapeth hym in his frende, that condiscendeth to the ryghtfull prayers of his frende: therfore I have given the a sufficient astrolabye for oure orizont, compowned after the latitude of Oxenforde: upon the whiche by mediacion of this lytell tretise, I purpose to teche the a certaine nombre of conclusions pertainynge to this same instrument. I say a certaine nombre of conclusions for thre causes, the first cause is this. Truste wel that al the conclusions that have be founden, or ells possiblye might be founde in so noble an instrument as in the astrolabye, ben unknowen perfitely to anye mortal man in this region, as I suppose. Another cause is this, that sothely in any cartes of the astrolabye that I have ysene, ther ben some conclusions, that wol not in al thinges perfourme ther behestes: and some of 'hem ben to harde to thy tender age of ten yere to conceve. This tretise divided in five partes, wil I shewe the wondir light rules and naked wordes in Englishe, for Latine ne canst thou nat yet but smale, my litel sonne. But neverthelesse suffiseth to the these trewe conclusyons in Englishe, as well as suffiseth to these noble clerkes Grekes these same conclusions in Greke, and to the Arabines in Arabike, and to the Jewes in Hebrewe, and to the Latin folke in Latyn: whiche Latyn folke had 'hem firste out of other divers langages, and write 'hem in ther owne tonge, that is to saine in Latine.

" And God wote that in all these langages and in manye mo, have these conclusyons ben sufficientlye lerned and taught, and yet by divers rules, right as divers pathes leden divers folke the right waye to Rome.

" Now wol I pray mekely every person discrete, that redeth or hereth this lityl tretise to have my rude ententing excused, and my superfluite of wordes, for two causes. The first cause is, for that curious enditynge and harde sentences is ful hevy at ones, for soch a childe to lerne. And the seconde cause is this, that sothely me semeth better to writen unto a child twise a gode sene nce, that he foriete it ones. And, Lowis, if it be so that I shewe the in my lith Englishe, as trew conclusions touching this mater, and not only as trewe but as many and subtil conclusions as ben yshewed in Latin, in any comon tretise of the astrolabye, conne me the more thanke, and praye God save the kinge, that is lorde of this langage, and all that him faith bereth, and obeieth everiche in his degree, the more and the lasse. But consydreth well, that I ne usurpe not to have founden this werke of my labour or of myne engin. I n'ame but a leude compilatour of the laboure of olde astrologiens, and have it translated in myn Englishe onely for thy doctrine: and with this swerde shal I slene envy.

" The first party.

" The first partye of this tretise shall reherce the figures, and the membres of thyne astrolaby, bycause that thou shalte have the greter knowinge of thine owne instrument.

" The seconde party.

" The seconde partye shal teche the to werken the very practike of the foresaid conclusions, as ferforthe and also narowe as may be shewed in so smale an instrument portatife aboute. For wel wote every astrologien, that smallest fractions ne wol not be shewed in so smal an instrument, as in subtil tables calculed for a cause."

The Prologue of the Testament of Love.

" Many men there ben, that with eres openly sprad so moche swalowen the deliciousnesse of jestes and of ryme, by queint knittinge coloures, that of the godenesse or of the badnesse of the sentence take they litel hede or els none.

" Sothelye dulle witte and a thoughtfulle soule so sore have mined and graffed in my spirites, that soche craft of enditinge woll nat ben of mine acquaintaunce. And for rude wordes and boistous percen the herte of the herer to the inrest point, and planten there the sentence of thinges, so that with litel helpe it is able to spring, this boke, that nothynge hath of the grete flode of wytte, ne of semelyche colours, is dolven with rude wordes and boistous, and so draw togiðer to maken the catchers therof ben the more redy to hent sentence.

" Some men there ben, that painten with colours riche and some with wers, as with red inke, and some with coles and chalke: and yet is there gode matter to the leude peple of thylke chalkye purtreyture, as 'hem thinketh for the time, and afterward the syght of the better colours yeven to 'hem more joye for the first leudenesse. So sothly this leude clowdy occupacyon is not to prayse, but by the leude, for comenly leude leudenesse commendeth. Eke it shal yeve sight that other precyous thynges shall be the more in reverence. In Latin and French hath many soveraine wittes had grete delyte to endite, and have many noble thinges fulfilde, but certes there ben some that speken ther poisye mater in Frenche, of whiche speche the Frenche men have as gode a fantasye as we have in heryng of Frenche mens Englishe. And many termes there ben in Englyshe, whiche unneth we Englishe men connen declare the knowleginge: howe should than a Frenche man borne? soche termes connejumpere in his matter, but as the jay chatereth Englishe. Right so truely the understandyn of Englishmen woll not stretche to the privie termes in Frenche, what so ever we bosten of straunge langage. Let than clerkes enditen in Latin, for they have the propertie of science, and the knowinge in that facultie: and lette Frenche men in ther Frenche also enditen ther queint termes, for it is kyndely to ther mouthes; and let us shewe our fantasies in such wordes as we lerneden of our dame's tonge. And although this boke be lytel thank worthy for the leudnesse in travaile, yet soch writing exiten men to thilke thinges that ben necessarie: for every man therby may as by a perpetual myrrour sene the vices or vertues of other, in whyche thynge lightly may be conceved to eschue perils, and necessaries to catch, after as aventures have fallen to other peple or persons.

" Certes the soverainst thinge of desire and most creture resonable, have or els shuld have full appetite to ther perfeccyon: unresonable bestes mowen not, sithe reson hath in 'hem no workinge: than resonable that wol not, is comparisoned to unresonable, and made lyke 'hem. Forsothe the most soveraine and final perfeccion of man is in knowynge of a sothe, withouten any entent decevable, and in love of one very God, that is inchaungeable, that is to knowe, and love his creator.

" Nowe principally the mene to brynge in knowleging and lovynge his creatour, is the consideracyon of thynges made by the creatour, wher through by thylke thinges that ben made, understandynge here to our wyttes, arne the unseen pryvities of God made to us syghtfull and knowinge, in our contemplacion and understondinge. These thinges than forsothe moche bringen us to the ful knowleginge sothe, and to the parfyte love of the maker of hevenly thynges. Lo! David saith: thou haste delited me in makinge, as who saith, to have delite in the tune how God hat lent me in consideracion of thy makinge. Wherof Aristotle in the boke de Animalibus, saith to naturell philosophers: it is a grete likynge in love of knowinge ther cretoure: and also in knowinge of causes in kindlye thynges, considrid forsothe the formes of kindelye thinges and the shap, a gret kyndely love we shulde have to the werkman that 'hem made. The crafte of a werkman is shewed in the werk. Herefore trulie the philosophers with a lyvely studie manie noble thinges, righte precious, and worthy to memorye, writen, and by a gret swet and travaille to us leften of causes the properties in natures of thinges, to whiche therfore philosophers it was more joy, more lykinge, more herty lust in kindely vertues and matters of reson the perfeccion by busy study to knowe, than to have had all the tresour, al the richesse, al the vaine glory, that the passed emperours, princes, or kinges hadden. Therfore the names of 'hem in the boke of perpetuall memorie in vertue and pece arne writen; and in the contrarie, that is to sainc, in Styxe the foule pitte of helle arne thilke pressed that soch godenes hated. And bicause this boke shall be of love, and the prime causes of stering in that doinge with passions and diseses for wantinge of desir, I will that this boke be cleped the testament of love.

" But nowe thou reder, who is thilke that will not in scorne laughe, to here a dwarfe or els halfe a man, say he wil rende out the swerde of Hercules handes, and also he shulde set Hercules Gades a mile yet ferther, and over that he had power of strength to pull up the spere, that Alisander the noble might never wagge, and that passinge al thinge to ben mayster of Fraunce by might, there as the noble gracious Edwarde the thirde for al his grete prowesse in victories ne might al yet conquere?

" Certes I wote well, ther shall be made more scorne and jape of me, that I so unworthely clothed altogither in the cloudie cloude of unconning, wil putten me in prees to speak of love, or els of the causes in that matter, sithen al the grettest clerkes han had ynough to don, and as who saith gathered up clene toforne 'hem, and with ther sharp sithes of conning al mowen and made therof grete rekes and noble, ful of al plenties to fede me and many an other. Envye forsothe commendeth noughte his reson, that he hath in hain, be it never so trusty. And although these noble repers, as gode workmen and worthy ther hier, han al draw an bounde up in the sheves, and made many shockes, yet have I ensample to gader the smale crommes, and fullin ma walet of tho that fallen from the bourde among the smalle houndes, notwithstanding the travaile of the almoigner, that hath draw up in the cloth al the remissailes, as trenchours, and the relefe to bere to the almesse. Yet also have I leve of the noble husbande Boece, although I be a straunger of conninge to come after his doctrine, and these grete workmen, and glene my handfuls of the shedynge after ther handes, and yf me faile ought of my ful, to encrese my porcion with that I shal drawe by privyties out of shockes; a slye servaunte in his owne helpe is often moche commended; knowynge of trouthe in causes of thynges, was more hardier in the firste sechers, and so sayth Aristotle, and lighter in us that han folowed after. For ther passing study han freshed our wittes, and oure understandynge han excited in consideracion of trouth by sharpenes of ther resons. Utterly these thinges be no dremes ne japes, to throwe to hogges, it is lyfelych mete for children of trouth, and as they me betiden whan I pilgramed out of my kith in wintere, whan the wether out of mesure was boistous, and the wyld wynd Boreas, as his kind asketh, with dryinge coldes maked the wawes of the ocean se so to arise unkindely over the commune bankes that it was in point to spill all the erthe."

(c) The Prologue of the CANTERBURY TALES of Chaucer.

" Whanne that April with his shoures sote
The droughte of March hath perced to the rote,
And bathed every veine in swiche licour,
Of whiche vertue engendred is the flour;
Whan Zephirus eke with his sote brethe
Enspired hath in every holt and hethe
The tendre croppes, and the yonge sonne
Hath in the Ram his halfe cours yronne,
And smale foules maken melodie,
That slepen alle night with open eye,
So priketh hem nature in her corages;
Than longen folk to gon on pilgrimages,
And palmeres for to seken strange strondes,
To serve halwes couthe in sondry londes;
And specially, from every shires ende
Of Englelond, to Canterbury they wende,
The holy blissful martyr for to seke,
That hem hath holpen, whan that they were seke.
" Befelle, that, in that seson on a day,
In Southwerk at the Tabard as I lay,
Redy to wenden on my pilgrimage
To Canterbury with devoute corage,
At night was come into that hostelrie
Wel nine and twenty in a compagnie
Of sondry folk, by aventure yfalle
In felawship, and pilgrimes were they alle,
That toward Canterbury wolden ride.
The chambres and the stables weren wide,
And wel we weren esed atte beste.
" And shortly, whan the sonne was gone to reste,
So hadde I spoken with hem everich on,
That I was of her felawship anon,
And made forword erly for to rise,
To take oure way ther as I you devise.
" But natheles, while I have time and space,
Or that I forther in this tale pace,
Me thinketh it accordant to reson,
To tellen you alle the condition

(c) [Dr. Johnson has copied both the poetry and prose of Chaucer from the edition of Urry in 1721; which Mr. Tyrwhitt the last accomplished editor of the poet's Canterbury Tales, pronounces most incorrect. This may be abundantly seen even by the comparison of so much of the Prologue, as Dr. Johnson took from Urry, with the text as now adopted from the excellent edition of Tyrwhitt. With the text of the remaining poems we must be content, till an elaborate and correct edition of the poet's works, which we greatly want, be given. Perhaps some little help is afforded towards such an important undertaking, in Illustrations of Gower and Chaucer, published in 1810; an account of several manuscripts of Chaucer, containing hitherto unemployed materials, being there given. See p. 116—182. Of the prose of Chaucer there has been less corruption.]

Of eche of hem, so as it semed me,
And whiche they weren, and of what degre;
And eke in what araie that they were inne:
And at a knight than wol I firste beginne.

THE KNIGHT.

"A knight ther was, and that a worthy man,
That fro the time that he firste began
To riden out, he loved chevalrie,
Trouthe and honour, fredom and curtesie.
Ful worthy was he in his lordes werre,
And therto hadde he ridden, no man ferre,
As wel in Cristendom as in Hethenesse,
And ever honoured for his worthinesse.
"At Alisandre he was whan it was wonne.
Ful often time he hadde the bord begonne
Aboven alle nations in Pruce.
In Lettowe had he reysed and in Ruce,
No cristen man so ofte of his degre.
In Gernade at the siege eke hadde he be
Of Algesir, and ridden in Belmarie.
At Leyes was he, and at Satalie,
Whan they were wonne; and in the Grete see
At many a noble armee hadde he be;
And foughten for our faith at Tramissene
In listes thries, and ay slain his fo.
"This ilke worthy knight hadde ben also
Somtime with the lord of Palatie.
Agen another hethen in Turkie:
And evermore he hadde a sovereine pris.
And though that he was worthy he was wise;
And of his port as meke as is a mayde.
He never yet no vilanie ne sayde
In alle his lif, unto no manere wight.
He was a veray parfit gentil knight.
"But for to tellen you of his araie,
His hors was good, but he was not gaie.
Of fustian he wered a gipon,
Alle besmottred with his habergeon,
For he was late ycome fro his viage,
And wente for to don his pilgrimage."

The HOUSE of FAME.

The first Boke.

"Now harken, as I have you saied,
What that I mette or I abraied,
Of December the teneth daie,
When it was night, to slepe I laie,
Right as I was wonte for to doen,
And fill aslepe wonder sone,
As he that was werie forgo
On pilgrimage miles two
To the corps of sainct Leonarde,
To maken lithe that erst was harde.

"But as me slept me mette I was
Within a temple imade of glas,
In whiche there weren mo images
Of golde, standyng in sondrie stages,
Sette in mo riche tabernacles,
And with perre mo pinnacles,
And mo curious portraitures,
And queint maner of figures
Of golde worke, then I sawe ever.
"But certainly I n'ist never

Where that it was, but well wist I
It was of Venus redily
This temple, for in purtreiture
I sawe anone right her figure
Nakid fletyng in a se,
And also on her hedde parde
Her rosy garland white and redde,
And her combe to kembe her hedde,
Her doves, and Dan Cupido
Her blinde sonne, and Vulcano,
That in his face was full broune.
" But as I romed up and doune,
I founde that on the wall there was
Thus written on a table of bras.
I woll now syng, if that I can,
The armes, and also the man,
That first came through his destine
Fugitife fro Troye the countre
In to Itaile, with full moche pine,
Unto the strondes of Lavine,
And tho began the storie anone,
As I shall tellen you echone.
" First sawe I the distruction
Of Troie, through the Greke Sinon,
With his false untrue forswerynges,
And with his chere and his lesynges,
That made a horse, brought into Troy,
By whiche Trojans loste all her joy.
" And after this was graved, alas!
How Ilions castell assailed was,
And won, and kyng Priamus slain,
And Polites his sonne certain,
Dispitously of Dan Pyrrhus.
" And next that sawe I how Venus,
When that she sawe the castell brende,
Doune from hevin she gan discende,
And bade her sonne Æneas fle,
And how he fled, and how that he
Escaped was from all the pres,
And toke his father, old Anchises,
And bare hym on his backe awaie,
Crying alas and welawaie!
The whiche Anchises in his hande,
Bare thro the goddess of the lande
I mene thilke that unbrenned were.
" Then sawe I next that all in fere
How Crusa, Dan Æneas wife,
Whom that he loved all his life,
And her yong sonne cleped Iulo,
And eke Ascanius also,
Fledden eke, with drerie chere,
That it was pite for to here,
And in a forest as thei went
At a tournyng of a went
How Crusa was yloste, alas!
That rede not I, how that it was
How he her sought, and how her ghoste
Bad hym flie the Grekes hoste,
And saied he must into Itaile,
As was his destinie, sauns faile,
That it was pitie for to here,
Whan her spirite gan appere,
The wordes that she to hym saied,
And for to kepe her sonne hym praied.
" There sawe I graven eke how he
His father eke, and his meyné,
With his shippes gan to saile
Toward the countrey of Itaile, &c." (d)

Gode Counsaile of Chaucer.

" Flie fro the prese and dwell with sothfastnesse,
Suffise unto thy gode though it be small,
For horde hath hate, and climbyng tikelnesse,
Prece hath envie, and wele is blent oer all,
Savour no more than the behoven shall,
Rede well thy self, that other folke canst rede,
And trouth the shall deliver, it is no drede.

" Paine the not eche croked to redresse,
In trust of her that turneth as a balle,
Grete rest standeth in litle businesse,
Beware also to spurne again a nalle,
Strive not as doth a crocke with a walle;
Demeth thy self that demest others dede,
And trouth the shall deliver, it is no drede.

(d) [I have in this and the following poems often preferred the readings of the old editions of Chaucer to those given by Dr. Johnson.]

" That the is sent receve in buxomenesse;
The wrastlyng of this worlde asketh a fall;
Here is no home, here is but wildernesse,
For the pilgrim; forth beest out of thy stall,
Loke up on high, and thanke God of all;
Weiveth thy luste and let thy ghost the lede,
And trouth the shall deliver, it is no drede."

Plaintife to Fortune.

" This wretched worldes transmutation
As wele and wo, nowe pore, and now honour,
Without order or due discretion
Governed is by fortunes errour,
But nathelesse the lacke of her favour
Ne maie not doe me syng though that I die,
J'ay tout perdu, mon temps et labeur,
For finally fortune I defie.

" Yet is me left the sight of my resoun
To knowen frende fro foe in thy mirrour,
So moche hath yet thy turnyng up and doun,
Itaughten me to knowen in an hour;
But truely no force of thy reddour
To hym that over hymself hath maistrie,
My suffisaunce yshal be my succour,
For finally fortune I defie.

" O Socrates, thou stedfast champion,
She ne might never be thy turmentour,
Thou never dreddist her oppression,
Ne in her chere founde thou no favour,
Thou knewe the disceyte of her colour,
And that her moste worship is for to lie:
I knowe her eke a false dissimulour,
For finally fortune I defie.

The Answere of Fortune.

" No man is wretched but hymself it wene,
He that yhath hymself hath suffisaunce.
Why saiest thou then I am to the so kene,
That hast thy self out of my governaunce?
Saie thus, grant mercie of thin habundaunce,
That thou hast lent or this, thou shalt not strive,
What wost thou yet how I wyl the avaunce?
And eke thou hast thy beste frende alive.

" I have the taught division betwene
Frende of effecte, and frende of countinaunce,
The nedeth not the galle of an hine,
That cureth eyen derke for ther penaunce,

(e) [" A Balade of the Village without Paintyng" is ascribed by Ritson to Lydgate. Bibl. Poet. p. 70. Mr. Tyrwhitt considers, however, what is here cited, as one of the genuine works of Chaucer. Canterb. Tales, 4to edit. vol. 2. p. 529, 530.]

Now seest thou clere that wer in ignoraunce,
Yet holt thine anker, and thou maiest arive
There bountie bereth the key of my substaunce,
And eke thou haste thy beste frende alive.

" How many have I refused to sustene,
Sith I have the fostred in thy plesaunce?
Wolt thou then make a statute on thy quene,
That I shall be aie at thine ordinaunce?
Thou born art in my reign of variaunce,
About the whele with other must thou drive:
My lore is bet, then wicke is thy grevance,
And eke thou hast thy beste frende alive.

The Answer to Fortune.

" That lore dampne, it is adversitie,
My frend maist thou not reven blind goddesse,
That I thy frendes knowe I thanke it the,
Take hem again, let hem go lie a presse,
The nigardes in kepying her richesse
Pronostike is thou wolt ther toure assaile,
Wicke appetite cometh aie before sickenesse,
In generall this rule ne maie not faile.

Fortune.

" Thou pinchest at my mutabilitie,
For I the lent a droppe of my richesse,
And now me liketh to withdrawen me,
Why shouldest thou my roialtie oppresse?
The se maie ebbe and flowen more and lesse,
The welken hath might to shine, rain, and haile,
Right so must I kithee my brotelnesse.
In generall this rule ne maie not faile.

The Plaintiffe.

" Lo, the execution of the majestie,
That all purveigheth of his rightwisenesse,
That same thyng fortune clepin ye,
Ye blinde bestes full of leudeness!
The heven hath propertie of sikerness,
This worlde hath evir restlesse travaile,
The last daie is the ende of myne entresse,
In generall this rule ne maie not faile.

Thenvoye of Fortune.

" Princes I praie you of your gentilnesse,
Let not this man on me thus crie and plain,
And I shall quiten you this businesse,
And if ye lyste releve hym of his pain,
Praie ye his best frende of his noblesse
That to some better state he maie attain."

[Of nearly the same time with Chaucer were the metrical translators, Johannes Capellanus or John the Chaplain, as he has been generally called, and Thomas Hoccleve or Occleve. The latter is also the writer of a few original poems; none of which, nor any part of his translation de Regimine Principum, afford a specimen of language at this period more to the purpose of illustration, than the lines which presently follow from Lydgate. Nor of the former would more than the bare mention be requisite, if he had not been mistaken by (f) Casley for Lydgate; and by (g) Ritson, who pretended to correct Casley, for John Walton canon of Oseney. This person, whose name is (h) added to a copy of his work, was John Tebaud alias Watyrbeche. His labour, which is a translation of Boethius, bears the date of 1410. Of himself he thus modestly speaks.

" To Chawceer that was flour of rhetoryk
In Englysh tonge, and excellent poete,
This woot I wel, no thyng may I do lyk:"

And, in the manner of Lydgate, confesses

" Defaut of langage and of eloquence:
And certayn I have tasted wonder lyte
Al of the welles of Calliope."]

Lydgate was a monk of Bury, who wrote about the same time with Chaucer. Out of his prologue to his third book of the Fall of Princes a few stanzas are selected, which, being compared with the style of his two contemporaries, will show that our language was then not written by caprice, but was in a settled state.

" Like a pilgrime which that goeth on foote,
And hath none horse to releue his trauayle,
Whote, dry and wery, and may find no bote
Of wel cold whan thrust doth hym assayle,
Wine nor licour, that may to hym auayle,
Right so fare I which, in my businesse,
No succour fynde my rudenes to redresse.

" I meane as thus, I haue no fresh licour
Out of the conduites of Calliope,
Nor through Clio in rhetorike no floure,
In my labour for to refresh me:
Nor of the susters in noumber thrise three,
Which with Cithera on Parnaso dwell,
They neuer me gaue drinke once of their wel.

" Nor of theyr springes clere and christaline,
That sprange by touchyng of the Pegase,
Their fauour lacketh my making ten lumine
I fynde theyr bawme of so great scarcitie,
To tame their tunnes with some drop of plentie
For Poliphemus throw his great blindnes,
Hath in me derked of Argus the brightnes.

" Our life here short of wit the great dulnes
The heuy soule troubled with trauayle,
And of memorye the glasyng brotelnes,
Drede and vncunning haue made a strong batail
With werines my spirite to assayle,
And with their subtil creping in most queint
Hath made my spirit in makyng for to feint.

" And ouermere, the ferefull frowardnes
Of my stepmother called obliuion,
Hath a bastyll of foryetfulnes,
To stoppe the passage, and shadow my reason
That I might haue no clere direccion,
In translating of new to quicke me,
Stories to write of olde antiquite.

" Thus was I set and stode in double werre
At the metyng of feareful wayes tweyne,
The one was this, who euer list to lere,
Whereas good wylle gan me constrayne,
Bochas taccomplish for to doe my payne,
Came ignoraunce, with a menace of drede,
My penne to rest I durste not procede."

[Section XII. Pecock.]

[The following is a specimen of prose in the days immediately subsequent to Chaucer, as the preceding lines from Lydgate are of the versification. Pecock was made bishop of St. Asaph in 1444, afterwards of Chichester. He was an opponent of the Wicliffites; and a man of great learning. From his book, entitled (i) The Repressor, written in 1449, the passage is selected; in which there is more than one sentiment that has been considered similar to the reasoning, and expression, employed by the venerable Hooker on similar points.

" Seie to me, good sire, and answere hereto; whanne men of the cuntree uplond bringen into Londoun, in Mydsomer eve, braunchis of trees fro Bischopis-wode and flouris fro the feeld; and bitaken tho to citessins of Londoun, for to therwith araie her housis; schulen men of Londoun, receyving and taking tho braunchis and flouris, seie and holde, that tho braunchis grewen out of the cartis which broughten hem to Londoun, and that tho cartis or the hondis of the bringers weren groundis and fundamentis of tho braunchis and flouris? Goddis forbode so litel witt be in her hedis. Certis thoug Crist and his apostlis weren now lyvyng at Londoun, and wolde bringe, so as is now seid, braunchis fro Bischopis-wode and flouris fro the feelde into Londoun, and wolden hem delyvere to men, that thei make her housis gay into remembrance of Seint Johnn Baptist, and of this that it was prophecied of him, that manye schulden joie in his burthe: yet tho men of Londoun, receyving so tho braunchis and flouris, oughten not to seie and feele, that tho braunchis and flouris grewen out of Christis hondis and out of the apostlis hondis. — Tho braunchis grewen out of the bowis, upon which thei in Bischopis-wode stoden; and tho bowis grewen out of stockis or tronchons; and the tronchons or shaftis grewen out of the roote; and the roote out of the next erthe therto, upon whiche and in whiche the roote is buried. So that neither the cart, neither the hondis of the bringers, neither tho bringers, ben the groundis or fundamentis of tho braunchis.

" The hool office and werk, into which God ordeyned holy scripture, is for to grounde articlis of feithe, and for to reherce and witnesse moral trouthis of (j) lawe of (k) kind grounded in moral philosophie; that is to seie, in (l) doom of resoun; that the reders be remembrid, stirrid, and exortid, bi so miche the better and the more, and the sooner for to fulfille hem."]

[Section XIII. Fortescue.]

Fortescue was chief justice of the Common-Pleas, in the reign of king Henry VI. He retired in 1471, after the battle of Tewkesbury, and probably wrote most of his works in his privacy. The following passage is selected from his book of the Difference between an absolute and limited Monarchy.

[The citation, which follows, is from the second chapter of the work, which was published, in 1714, with some remarks, by J. Fortescue-Aland, of the Inner Temple, from a (m) collation of manuscripts. In the preface, this learned editor adverts to the style of Fortescue; which here deserves especial notice.

" (n) As to the language, it is the English of those times, participating very much of the nature of the Saxon tongue; for it has in it many words, and terminations of words, as also many phrases, purely Saxon. And I chose to publish it in its own native dress, not only as it is a curious piece of antiquity, but that every man may be a judge for himself of the true sense and meaning of our author, and lay no imputation on the publisher of altering the sense, in attempting to give it a more modern dress."]

Chap. II.

" Hyt may peraventure be marvelid by some men, why one Realme is a Lordshyp only Royall, and the Prynce thereof rulyth yt by his Law, callid Jus Regale; and another Kyngdome is a Lordschip, Royal and Politike, and the Prince thereof rulyth by a Lawe, callyd Jus Politicum & Regale; sythen thes two Princes beth of egall Astate.

" To this dowte it may be answeryd in this manner: the first Institution of thes twoo Realmys, upon the Incorporation of them, is the Cause of this diversyte.

" Whan Nembroth by Might, for his own Glorye, made and incorporate the first Realme, and subduyd it to hymself by Tyrannye, he would not have it governyd by any other Rule or Lawe, but by his own Will; by which and for th' accomplishment thereof he made it. And therfor, though he had thus made a Realme, holy Scripture denyyd to cal hym a Kyng, Quia Rex dicitur a Regendo. Whych thyng he dyd not, but oppressyd the People by Myght; and therfor he was a Tyrant, and callid Primus Tyrannorum. But holy Writ callith hym Robustus Venator coram Deo. For as the Hunter takyth the wyld beste for to scle and eate hym; so Nembroth subduyd to him

(j) [The law of God, though principally delivered for instruction in supernatural duties, is yet fraught with precepts of those that are natural. The Scripture is fraught even with laws of nature. Hooker, Eccl. Polity, B. i. § 12. the People with Might, to have their service and their goods, using upon them the Lordschip that is callid Dominium Regale tantum. After hym Belus that was callid first a Kyng, and after hym his Sone Nynus, and after hym other Panyms; They, by Example of Nembroth, made them Realmys, would not have them rulyd by other Lawys than by their own Wills. Which Lawys ben right good under good Princes; and their Kyngdoms ar then most resemblyd to the Kyngdome of God, which reynith upon Man, rulyng him by hys own Will. Wherfor many Crystyn Princes usen the same Lawe; and therfor it is, that the Lawys sayen, Quod Principi placuit, Legis habet vigorem. And thus I suppose first beganne, in Realmys, Dominium tantum Regale. But afterward, when Mankynd was more mansuete, and better disposyd to Vertue, Grete Communalties, as was the Feliship, that came into this Lond with Brute, wyllyng to be unyed and made a Body Politike callid a Realme, havyng an Heed to governe it; as, after the Saying of the Philosopher, every Communaltie unyed of many parts must needs have an Heed; than they chose the same Brute to be their Heed and Kyng. And they and he upon this Incorporation and Institution, and onyng of themself into a Realme, ordeynyd the same Realme, so to be rulyd and justyfyd by such Laws, as they al would assent unto; which Law therfor is callid Politicum; and bycause it is mynystrid by a Kyng, it is callid Regale. Dominium Politicum dicitur quasi Regimen, plurium Scientia sive Consilio ministratum. The Kyng of Scotts reynith upon his People by this Lawe, videlicet, Regimine Politico & Regali. And as Diodorus Syculus saith, in his Boke de priscis Historiis, The Realme of Egypte is rulid by the same Lawe, and therfor the Kyng thereof chaungith not his Lawes, without the Assent of his People. And in like forme as he saith is ruled the Kyngdome of Saba, in Felici Arabia, and the Lond of Libie; and also the more parte of al the Realmys in Afarike. Which manner of Rule and Lordship the sayd Diodorus, in that Boke, praysith gretely. For it is not only good for the Prince, that may thereby the more sewerly do Justice, than by his owne Arbitriment; but it is also good for his People, that receyve therby such Justice as they desyer themself. Now as me seymth, it ys shewyd opinly ynough, why one Kyng rulyth and reynith on his People, Dominio tantum Regali, and that other reynith Dominio Politico & Regali: For that one Kyngdome beganne of, and by, the Might of the Prince; and that other beganne by the Desier, and Institution, of the People of the same Prince."

[Section XIV. Lord Rivers. Caxton.]

[Before we pass to Barclay, or to Sir Thomas More the next author cited by Dr. Johnson, it may be proper briefly to exhibit two earlier and curious specimens of composition: the one from the translation, entitled The Dictes and Sayings of the Philosophers, by Anthony Wydville, earl Rivers, which was published in 1477: the other from The Mayster of Sentence, printed by Caxton in 1483. Fabian, the chronicler, and Fisher, bishop of Rochester, are also writers anterior to Sir Thomas More; in whose labours, however, there is nothing so remarkable as to require an extract. The pithiness of the following extracts cannot but please.

" (o) Ther be thre estates of men that be knowen in thre maners, that is to witt, the pacient is not knowen but in his adversite, and in his ire; the valiaunt man is not knowen but in werre; and the frende is not knowen but in necessite. Of all other maners and condicions the warste is, a man to be suspecious of his frende; and to discover thinges secrete; to truste and affiaunce in every man; to speke over muche of thinges unprofitable; and to be in daunger of evyl people for covetice of goodes temporale. Bewar and kepe the that thou be not suspecious; for suspecion taketh away the love from the people. Witte without doctrine is as a tre without fruyte. For to be joyous, and to salew every manne gladly, to be liberale in yeving and receyvyng, and to foryeve gladly his evyl will, maken a man to be beloved by yche body." ——

" (p) Be not glad of the falle or evyl fare of thy neyghbour, lest God turne his wreth fro hym to the; and so thou sholdest falle in the same or worse. But be glad to sorowe for hym that is diseasid; and evermore morne his myschief, as thou woldest thyn oune. Love peace outward and inward; peace wyth all men: and make peace there hate is. Fle chydyng; be waar and doo aweye the occasion of stryf, and lyve allewey in peace. Lete no thyng passe thy lippys, that may defoule the eeris of the herers. For a vayn word is take of a veyn conscience; and suche as the word is, suche is the soule. Therfore besy the not to speke that lykyth, but that that nedyth. Take hede what thou spekyst, and what thou spekyst not; and both in spekyng and not spekyng be right well waar; for thou mayest not call ayene that thou hast seyde. Kut fro thy tunge the synne of backbytyng. And defoule not thy mouth with another mannys synne, but be sory of hym; and that thou backbytest in another, drede it in thyself. When thou blamest another, thynke on thyn oune synne, and loke not on other mennys. For thou shalt never backbite, yf thou wylt beholde thyself."]

[Section XV. Barclay.]

[Alexander Barclay, rector of Allhallows, Lombard-street, London, is known as a poet principally by his Ship of Fools; which was written, not in 1550, as Dr. Johnson has misdated it, but in 1508, as the author himself tells us. I have therefore removed the specimen of his style, from the close of Dr. Johnson's history of the language, to its proper place.]

Of Mockers and Scorners, and false Accusers.

" O heartless fooles, haste here to our doctrine,
Leaue off the wayes of your enormitie,
Enforce you to my preceptes to encline,
For here shall I shewe you good and veritie:
Encline, and ye finde shall great prosperitie,
Ensuing the doctrine of our fathers olde,
And godly lawes in valour worth great golde.

" Who that will followe the graces manyfolde
Which are in vertue, shall finde auauncement:
Wherfore ye fooles that in your sinne are bolde,
Ensue ye wisdome, and leaue your lewde intent,
Wisdome is the way of men most excellent:
Therefore haue done, and shortly spede your pace,
To quaynt your self and company with grace.

" Learne what is vertue, therin is great solace,
Learne what is truth, sadnes and prudence,
Let grutche be gone, and grauitie purchase,
Forsake your folly and inconuenience,
Cease to be fooles, and ay to sue offence,
Followe ye vertue, chiefe roote of godlynes,
For it and wisedome is ground of clenlynes.

" Wisedome and vertue two thinges are doubtles,
Whiche man endueth with honour speciall,
But suche heartes as slepe in foolishnes
Knoweth nothing, and will nought know at all:
But in this little barge in principall
All foolish mockers I purpose to repreue,
Clawe he his backe that feeleth itche or greue.

" Mockers and scorners that are harde of beleue,
With a rough combe here will I clawe and grate,
To proue if they will from their vice remeue,
And leaue their folly, which causeth great debate:
Suche caytiues spare neyther poore man nor estate,
And where their selfe are moste worthy derision,
Other men to scorne is all their most condition.

" Yet are mo fooles of this abusion,
Whiche of wise men despiseth the doctrine,

With mowes, mockes, scorne, and collusion,
Rewarding rebukes for their good discipline:
Shewe to suche wisdome, yet shall they not encline
Unto the same, but set nothing therby,
But mocke thy doctrine, still or openly.
" So in the worlde it appeareth commonly,
That who that will a foole rebuke or blame,
A mocke or mowe shall he haue by and by:
Thus in derision haue fooles their speciall game.
Correct a wise man that would eschue ill name,
And fayne would learne, and his lewde life amende,
And to thy wordes he gladly shall intende.
" If by misfortune a rightwise man offende,
He gladly suffereth a iuste correction,
And him that him teacheth taketh for his frende,
Him selfe putting mekely unto subiection,
Folowing his preceptes and good direction:
But yf that one a foole rebuke or blame,
He shall his teacher hate, slaunder, and diffame.
" Howbeit his wordes oft turne to his own shame,
And his owne dartes retourne to him agayne,
And so is he sore wounded with the same,
And in wo endeth, great misery, and payne.
It also proued full often is certayne,
That they that on mockers alway their mindes cast,
Shall of all other be mocked at the last.
" He that goeth right, stedfast, sure, and fast,
May him well mocke that goeth halting and lame,
And he that is white may well his scornes cast,
Agaynst a man of Inde: but no man ought to blame
Anothers vice, while he vseth the same.
But who that of sinne is cleane in deede and thought,
May him well scorne whose liuing is starke nought.
" The scornes of Naball full dere should haue been bought,
If Abigayl his wife, discrete and sage,
Had not by kindnes right crafty meanes sought,
The wrath of Dauid to temper and asswage.
Hath not two beares in their fury and rage
Two and fortie children rent and torne,
For they the prophete Helyseus did scorne?
" So might they curse the time that they were borne,
For their mocking of this prophete diuine:
So many other of this sort often mourne
For their lewde mockes, and fall into ruine.
Thus is it foly for wise men to encline
To this lewde flocke of fooles, for see thou shall
Them moste scorning that are most bad of all.

The Lenuoy of Barclay to the Fooles.

" Ye mocking fooles that in scorne set your ioy,
Proudly despising Gods punition:
Take ye example by Cham the sonne of Noy,
Which laughed his father vnto derision,

Which him after cursed for his transgression,
And made him seruaunt to all his lyne and stocke.
So shall ye caytifs at the conclusion,
Since ye are nought, and other scorne and mocke."

[Section XVI. Sir Thomas More. Skelton.]

Of the works of Sir Thomas More it was necessary to give a larger specimen, both because our language was then in a great degree formed and settled, and because it appears from Ben Jonson, that his works were considered as models of pure and elegant style. The tale, which is placed first, because earliest written, will show what an attentive reader will, in perusing our old writers, often remark, that the familiar and colloquial part of our language, being diffused among those classes who had no ambition of refinement, or affectation of novelty, has suffered very little change. There is another reason why the extracts from this author are more copious: his works are carefully and correctly printed, and may therefore be better trusted than any other edition of the English books of that, or the preceding ages.

A merry iest how a sergeant would learne to playe the frere. Written by maister Thomas More in hys youth.

" Wyse men alway,
Affyrme and say,
That best is for a man;
Diligently,
For to apply,
The busines that he can,
And in no wyse,
To enterpryse,
An other faculte,
For he that wyll,
And can no skyll,
Is neuer lyke to the.
He that hath lafte
The hosiers crafte,
And falleth to making shone,
The smythe that shall,
To payntyng fall,
His thrift is well nigh done.
A blacke draper,
With whyte paper,
To goe to writyng scole,
An olde butler,
Becum a cutler,
I wene shall proue a fole.
And an olde trot,
That can I wot,
Nothyng but kysse the cup,
With her phisick,
Wil kepe one sicke,
Tyll she have soused hym vp.
A man of lawe,
That neuer sawe
The wayes to bye and sell,
Wenyng to ryse,
By marchaundise,
I wish to spede hym well.
A marchaunt eke,
That wyll goo seke,
By all the meanes he may,
To fall in sute,
Tyll he dispute
His money cleane away,
Pletyng the lawe
For euery strawe,
Shall proue a thrifty man,
With bate and strife,
But by my life,
I cannot tell you whan.
Whan an hatter
Wyll go smatter,
In philosophy,
Or a pedlar,
Ware a medlar
In theology,
All that ensue
Suche craftes new,
They driue so farre a cast,
That euermore,
They do therfore
Beshrewe themselfe at last.
This thing was tryed
And verefyed,
Here by a sergeaunt late,
That thriftly was,
Or he coulde pas,
Rapped about the pate,
Whyle that he would See how he could
A little play the frere:
Now yf you wyll
Knowe how it fyll,
Take hede and ye shall here.

It happed so,
Not long ago,
A thrifty man there dyed,
An hundred pounde,
Of nobles rounde,
That had he layd a side:
His sonne he wolde
Should haue this golde,
For to beginne with all:
But to suffise
His chylde, well thrise,
That money was to smal.
Yet or this day
I have hard say,
That many a man, certesse,
Hath with good cast,
Be ryche at last,
That hath begonne with lesse.
But this yonge manne
So well beganne
His money to imploy,
That, certainly,
His policy,
To see it was a joy,
For lest sum blast
Myght ouer cast
His ship, or by mischaunce,
Men, with sum wile,
Myght hym begyle,
And minish his substaunce,
For to put out
Al maner dout,
He made a good puruay
For euery whyt,
By his owne wyt,
And toke an other way:
First fayre and wele,
Therof much dele,
He dygged it in a pot,
But then him thought,
That way was nought,
And there he left it not.
So was he faine,
From thence agayne,
To put it in a cup,
And by and by,
Couetously,
He supped it fayre vp,
In his owne brest,
He thought it best
His money to enclose,
Than wist he well,
What euer fell,
He coulde it neuer lose.

He borrowed then,
Of other men,
Money and marchaundise:
Neuer payd it,
Up he laid it,
In like maner wyse.
Yet on the gere,
That he would were,
He reight not what he spent,
So it were nyce,
As for the price,
Could him not miscontent.
With lusty sporte,
And with resort,
Of ioly company,
In mirth and play,
Full many a day,
He liued merely.
And men had sworne,
Some man is borne,
To haue a lucky howre,
And so was he,
For such degre
He gat and suche honour,
That without dout,
Whan he went out,
A sergeaunt well and fayre,
Was redy strayte,
On him to wayte,
As sone as on the mayre.
But he doubtlesse,
Of his mekenesse,
Hated such pompe and pride,
And would not go,
Companied so,
But drewe himself a side.
To saint Katharine,
Streight as a line,
He gate him at a tyde,
For deuocion,
Or promocion,
There would he nedes abyde.
There spent he fast,
Till all were past,
And to him came there meny
To aske theyr det,
But none could get,
The valour of a peny.
With visage stout,
He bare it out,
Euen vnto the harde hedge,
A month or twaine,
Tyll he was faine
To laye his gowne to pledge.

Than was he there,
In greater feare,
  Than ere that he came thither,
And would as fayne,
Depart againe,
  But that he wist not whither.
Than after this,
To a frende of his,
  He went and there abode,
Where as he lay,
So sick alway,
  He myght not come abrode.
It happed than,
A marchant man,
  That he ought money to,
Of an officere
That gan enquere,
  What him was best to do.
And he answerde,
Be not aferde,
  Take an accion therfore,
I you beheste
I shall hym reste,
  And than care for no more.
I feare, quod he,
It wyll not be,
  For he wyll not come out.
The sergeaunt said,
Be not afrayd,
  It shall be brought about.
In many a game,
Lyke to the same,
  Haue I bene well in vre,
And for your sake,
Let me be bake,
  But yf I do this cure.
Thus part they both,
And foorth then goth
  A pace this officere,
And for a day,
All his array,
  He chaunged with a frere.
So was he dight,
That no man might
  Hym for a frere deny,
He dopped and dooked,
He spake and looked,
  So religiously.
Yet in a glasse,
Or he would passe,
  He toted and he peered,
His harte for pryde
Lepte in his syde,
  To see how well he freered.

Than forth a pace,
Unto the place,
  He goeth withouten shame
To do this dede,
But now take hede,
  For here begynneth the game.
He drew hym ny,
And softely
  Streyght at the dore he knocked:
And a damsell,
That hard hym well,
  There came and it vnlocked.
The frere sayd,
Good spede fayre mayd,
  Here lodgeth such a man,
It is told me:
Well syr, quod she,
  And yf he do what than?
Quod he, maystresse,
No harm doutlesse:
  It longeth for our order,
To hurt no man,
But as we can,
  Euery wight to forder.
With hym truly
Fayne speake would I.
  Sir, quod she, by my fay,
He is so sike,
Ye be not lyke
  To speake with hym to day.
Quod he, fayre may,
Yet I you pray,
  This much at my desire,
Vouchesafe to do,
As go hym to,
  And say an Austen frere
Would with him speke,
And matters breake,
  For his auayle certayn.
Quod she, I wyll,
Stonde ye here styll,
  Tyll I come downe agayn.
Vp is she go,
And told hym so,
  As she was bode to say.
He mistrustyng
No maner thyng,
  Sayd, mayden go thy way,
And fetch him hyder,
That we togyder,
  May talk. A downe she gothe,
Vp she hym brought,
No harme she thought,
  But it made some folke wrothe.

This officere,
This fayned frere,
Whan he was come aloft,
He dopped than,
And grete this man,
Religiously and oft.
And he agayn,
Ryght glad and fayn,
Toke hym there by the hande:
The frere than sayd,
Ye be dismayd,
With trouble I understande.
In dede, quod he,
It hath with me
Bene better than it is.
Syr, quod the frere,
Be of good chere,
Yet shall it after this.
But I would now
Comen with you,
In counsayle yf you please,
Or ellys nat
Of matters that,
Shall set your heart at ease.
Downe went the mayd,
The marchaunt sayd,
Now say on, gentle frere,
Of thys tydyng,
That ye me bryng,
I long full sore to here.
Whan there was none,
But they alone,
The frere, with euyll grace,
Sayd, I rest the,
Come on with me,
And out he toke his mace:
Thou shalt obay,
Come on thy way,
I have the in my clouche,
Thou goest not hence,
For all the pense,
The mayre hath in his pouche.
This marchaunt there,
For wrath and fere,
He waxyng welnygh wood,
Sayd, horson thefe,
With a mischefe,
Who hath taught the thy good?
And with his fist,
Vpon the lyst,
He gaue hym such a blow,
That backward downe,
Almost in sowne,
The frere is ouerthrow.

Yet was this man,
Well fearder than,
Lest he the frere had slayne,
Tyll with good rappes,
And heuy clappes,
He dawde hym vp agayne.
The frere toke harte,
And vp he starte,
And well he layde about,
And so there goth,
Betwene them both,
Many a lusty clout.
They rent and tere
Eche others here,
And claue togyder fast,
Tyll with luggyng,
And with tuggyng,
They fell downe bothe at last.
Than on the grounde,
Togyder rounde,
With many a sadde stroke,
They roll and rumble,
They turne and tumble,
As pygges do in a poke.
So long aboue,
They heue and shoue,
Togider that at last,
The mayd and wyfe,
To breake the strife,
Hyed them vpward fast.
And whan they spye
The captaynes lye,
Both waltring on the place,
The freres hood,
They pulled a good,
Adowne about his face.
Whyle he was blynde,
The wenche behynde,
Lent him, leyd on the flore,
Many a ioule,
About the noule,
With a great batyldore.
The wyfe came yet,
And with her fete,
She holpe to kepe him downe,
And with her rocke,
Many a knocke,
She gaue hym on the crowne.
They layd his mace,
About his face,
That he was wood for payne;
The fryre frappe
Gate many a swappe,
Tyll he was full nygh slayne.

Vp they hym lift,
And with yll thrift,
  Hedlyng a long the stayre;
Down they hym threwe,
And sayde, adewe,
  Commende us to the mayre.
The frere arose,
But I suppose,
  Amased was his hed,
He shoke his eares,
And from grete feares
  He thought hym well yfled.
Quod he, now lost
Is all this cost,
  We be neuer the nere.
Ill mote he be,
That caused me,
  To make my self a frere.
Now masters all,
Here now I shall
  Ende there as I began,
In any wyse,
I would auyse,
  And counsayle euery man,
His owne craft vse,
All newe refuse,
  And lyghtly let them gone:
Play not the frere,
Now make good chere,
  And welcome euerych one."

A ruful lamentacion (writen by master THOMAS MORE in his youth) of the deth of quene Elisabeth mother to king Henry the eight, wife to king Henry the seuenth, and eldest doughter to king Edward the fourth, which quene Elisabeth dyed in childbed in February in the yere of our Lord 1503, and in the 18 yere of the raigne of king Henry the seuenth.

"O ye that put your trust, and confidence,
In worldly ioy and frayle prosperite,
That so lyue here as ye should neuer hence,
Remember death and loke here vppon me.
Ensaumple I thynke there may no better be.
Your selfe wotte well that in this realme was I
Your quene but late, and lo now here I lye.
  "Was I not borne of olde worthy linage?
Was not my mother queene, my father kyng?
Was I not a kinges fere in marriage?
Had I not plenty of euery pleasaunt thyng?
Mercifull God, this is a straunge reckenyng:
Rychesse, honour, welth, and auncestry,
Hath me forsaken, and lo now here I ly.
  "If worship myght haue kept me, I had not gone.
If wyt myght haue me saued, I neded not fere.
If money might haue holpe, I lacked none.
But O good God, what vayleth all this gere?
When deth is come thy mighty messangere,
Obey we must there is no remedy,
Me hath he sommoned, and lo now here I ly.
  "Yet was I late promised otherwyse,
This yere to liue in welthe and delice.
Lo where to commeth thy blandishyng promyse,
O false astrology and deuynatrice,
Of Goddes secretes makyng thy selfe so wyse.
How true is for this yere thy prophecy.
The yere yet lasteth, and lo nowe here I ly.
  "O bryttill welth, as full of bitternesse,
Thy single pleasure doubled is with payne.
Account my sorow first and my distresse,
In sondry wyse, and recken there agayne,
The ioy that I haue had, and I dare sayne,

For all my honour, endured yet haue I,
More wo then welth, and lo now here I ly.
" Where are our castels, now where are our towers,
Goodly Rychmonde sone art thou gone from me,
At Westminster that costly worke of yours,
Myne owne dere lorde now shall I neuer see.
Almighty God vouchesafe to graunt that ye,
For you and your children well may edefy.
My palyce bylded is, and lo now here I ly.
" Adew myne owne dere spouse my worthy lorde,
The faithfull loue, that dyd vs both combyne,
In mariage and peasable concorde,
Into your handes here I cleane resyne,
To be bestowed vppon your children and myne.
Erst wer you father, and now must ye supply
The mothers part also, for lo now here I ly.
" Farewell my doughter lady Margarete.
God wotte full oft it greued hath my mynde,
That ye should go where we should seldome mete.
Now am I gone, and haue left you behynde.
O mortall folke that we be very blynde.
That we least feare, full oft it is most nye,
From you depart I fyrst, and lo now here I lye.
" Farewell Madame my lordes worthy mother,
Comfort your sonne, and be ye of good chere.
Take all a worth, for it will be no nother.
Farewell my doughter Katherine late the fere
To prince Arthur myne owne chyld so dere,
It booteth not for me to wepe or cry,
Pray for my soule, for lo now here I ly.
" Adew lord Henry, my louyng sonne adew.
Our lorde encrease your honour and estate,
Adew my doughter Mary bright of hew,
God make you vertuous wyse and fortunate.
Adew swete hart my litle doughter Kate,
Thou shalt swete babe, suche is thy desteny,
Thy mother neuer know, for lo now here I ly.
" Lady Cicyly, Anne, and Katheryne,
Farewell my welbeloved sisters three,
O lady Briget other sister myne,
Lo here the ende of worldly vanitee.
Now well are ye that earthly folly flee,
And heuenly thynges loue and magnify,
Farewell and pray for me, for lo now here I ly.
" Adew my lordes, adew my ladies all,
Adew my faithful seruauntes euerych one,
Adew my commons whom I neuer shall
See in this world; wherfore to the alone,
Immortall God, verely three and one,
I me commende. Thy infinite mercy,
Shew to thy seruant, for lo now here I ly."

Certain meters in English written by master THOMAS MORE in hys youth for the boke of fortune, and caused them to be printed in the begynnyng of that boke.

The words of Fortune to the People.

" Mine high estate, power, and auctoritie,
If ye ne know, enserche and ye shall spye,
That richesse, worship, welth, and dignitie,
Joy, rest, and peace, and all thyng fynally,
That any pleasure or profit may come by,
To mannes comfort, ayde, and sustinaunce,
Is all at my deuyse and ordinaunce.
" Without my fauour there is nothyng wonne.
Many a matter haue I brought at last,
To good conclusion, that fondly was begonne.
And many a purpose, bounden sure and fast
With wise prouision, I haue ouercast.
Without good happe there may no wit suffise.
Better is to be fortunate than wyse.
" And therefore hath there some men bene or this,
My deadly foes and written many a boke,
To my disprayse. And other cause there nys,
But for me list not frendly on them loke.
Thus lyke the fox they fare that once forsoke
The plesaunt grapes, and gan for to defy them,
Because he lept and yet could not come by them.
" But let them write, theyr labour is in vayne.
For well ye wote, myrth, honour, and richesse,
Much better is than penury and payne.
The nedy wretch that lingereth in distresse,
Without myne help is euer comfortlesse,
A wery burden odious and loth,
To all the world, and eke to him selfe both.
" But he that by my fauour may ascende
To mighty power and excellent degree,
A common wele to gouerne and defende,
O in how blist condicion standeth he:
Him self in honour and felicite,
And ouer that, may forther and increase
A region hole in ioyfull rest and peace.
" Now in this poynt there is no more to say,
Eche man hath of him self the gouernaunce.
Let euery wight than folowe his owne way,
And he that out of pouertee and mischaunce,
List for to liue, and wyll him selfe enhaunce,
In wealth and richesse, come forth and wayte on me.
And he that wyll be a beggar, let hym be."

THOMAS MORE to them that trust in Fortune.

" Thou that are prowde of honour, shape or kynne,
That hepest vp this wretched worldes treasure,
Thy fingers shrined with gold, thy tawny skynne
With fresh apparyle garnished out of measure,
And wenest to haue Fortune at thy pleasure,

Cast vp thyne eye, and loke how slipper chaunce
Illudeth her men with chaunge and varyaunce.
" Sometyme she loketh as louely, fayre, and bright,
As goodly Venus mother of Cupyde.
She becketh and she smileth on euery wight.
But this chere fayned may not long abide.
There cometh a cloude, and farewell all our pryde.
Like any serpent she beginneth to swell,
And looketh as fierce as any fury of hell.
" Yet for all that we brotle men are fayne,
(So wretched is our nature and so blynde)
As soone as Fortune list to laugh agayne,
With fayre countenaunce and disceitfull mynde,
To crouche and knele and gape after the wynde,
Not one or twayne but thousandes in a rout,
Lyke swarmyng bees come flickeryng her aboute.
" Then as a bayte she bryngeth forth her ware,
Siluer, gold, riche perle, and precious stone:
On whiche the mased people gase and stare,
And gape therefore, as dogges doe for the bone.
Fortune at them laugheth, and in her trone
Amyd her treasure and wauering rychesse,
Prowdly she houeth as lady and empresse.
" Fast by her syde doth wery labour stand,
Pale fere also, and sorow all bewept,
Disdayn and hatred on that other hand,
Eke restles watche fro slepe with trauayle kept,
His eyes drowsy and lokyng as he slept.
Before her standeth daunger and enuy,
Flattery, dysceyt, mischiefe and tiranny.
" About her commeth all the world to begge.
He asketh lande, and he to pas would bryng
This toye and that, and all not worth an egge:
He would in loue prosper aboue all thyng:
He kneleth downe and would be made a kyng:
He forceth not so he may money haue,
Though all the worlde accompt hym for a knaue.
" Lo thus ye see diuers heddes, diuers wittes.
Fortune alone as diuers as they all,
Vnstable here and there among them flittes:
And at auenture downe her giftes fall,
Catch who so may she throweth great and small
Not to all men, as commeth sonne or dewe,
But for the most part, all among a fewe.
" And yet her brotell giftes long may not last.
He that she gaue them, loketh prowde and hye.
She whirlth about and pluckth away as fast,
And geueth them to an other by and by.
And thus from man to man continually,
She vseth to geue and take, and slily tosse,
One man to wynnyng of an others losse.
" And when she robbeth one, down goth his pryde.
He wepeth and wayleth and curseth her full sore.
But he that receueth it, on that other syde,

Is glad, and blesth her often tymes therefore.
But in a whyle when she loueth hym no more,
She glydeth from hym, and her giftes to,
And he her curseth, as other fooles do.
" Alas the folysh people can not cease,
Ne voyd her trayne, tyll they the harme do fele.
About her alway, besely they preace.
But lord how he doth thynk hym self full wele,
That may set once his hande vppon her whele.
He holdeth fast: but vpward as he flieth,
She whippeth her whele about, and there he lyeth.
" Thus fell Julius from his mighty power.
Thus fell Darius the worthy kyng of Perse.
Thus fell Alexander the great conquerour.
Thus many mo then I may well reherse.
Thus double Fortune, when she lyst reuerse
Her slipper fauour fro them that in her trust,
She fleeth her wey and leyeth them in the dust.
" She sodeinly enhaunceth them aloft.
And sodeynly mischeueth all the flocke.
The head that late lay easily and full soft,
In stede of pylows lyeth after on the blocke.
And yet alas the most cruell proude mocke:
The deynty mowth that ladyes kissed haue,
She bryngeth in the case to kisse a knaue.
"In chaungyng of her course, the chaunge shewth this,
Vp startth a knaue, and downe there falth a knight,
The beggar ryche, and the ryche man pore is.
Hatred is turned to loue, loue to despyght.
This is her sport, thus proueth she her myght.
Great boste she maketh yf one be by her power,
Welthy and wretched both within an howre.
" Pouertee that of her giftes wyl nothing take,
Wyth mery chere, looketh vppon the prece,
And seeth how Fortunes houshold goeth to wrake.
Fast by her standeth the wyse Socrates,
Arristippus, Pythagoras, and many a lese
Of olde philosophers. And eke agaynst the sonne
Bekyth hym poore Diogenes in his tonne.
" With her is Byas, whose countrey lackt defence,
And whylom of their foes stode so in dout,
That eche man hastely gan to cary thence,
And asked hym why he nought caryed out.
I bere quod he all myne with me about:
Wisedom he ment, not Fortunes brotle fees.
For nought he counted his that he might leese.
" Heraclitus eke lyst felowship to kepe
With glad pouertee, Democritus also:
Of which the fyrst can neuer cease but wepe,
To see how thick the blynded people go,
With labour great to purchase care and wo.
That other laugheth to see the foolysh apes,
Howe earnestly they walk about theyr capes.
" Of this poore sect, it is comen vsage,
Onely to take that nature may sustayne,

Banishing cleane all other surplusage,
They be content, and of nothyng complayne.
No nygarde eke is of his good so fayne.
But they more pleasure haue a thousande folde,
The secrete draughtes of nature to beholde.
" Set Fortunes servauntes by them and ye wull,
That one is free, that other euer thrall,
That one content, that other neuer full.
That one in suretye, that other lyke to fall.
Who lyst to aduise them bothe, parceyue he shall
As great difference between them as we see,
Betwixte wretchednes and felicite.
" Nowe haue I shewed you bothe : these whiche ye lyst,
Stately Fortune, or humble Pouertee :
That is to say, nowe lyeth it in your fyst,
To take here bondage, or free libertee.
But in thys poynte and ye do after me,
Draw you to Fortune, and labour her to please,
If that ye thynke your selfe to well at ease.
" And fyrst vppon the louely shall she smile,
And frendly on the cast her wandering eyes,
Embrace the in her armes, and for a whyle,
Put the and kepe the in a fooles paradise :
And foorth with all what so thou lyst deuise,
She wyll the graunt it liberally parhappes :
But for all that beware of after clappes.
" Recken you neuer of her fauoure sure :
Ye may in clowds as easily trace an hare,
Or in drye lande cause fishes to endure,
And make the burnyng fyre his heate to spare,
And all thys worlde in compace to forfare,
As her to make by craft or engine stable,
That of her nature is euer variable.
" Serue her day and nyght as reuerently,
Vppon thy knees as any seruaunt may,
And in conclusion, that thou shalt winne thereby
Shall not be worth thy servyce I dare say.
And looke yet what she geueth the to day,
With labour wonne she shall haply to morow
Pluck it agayne out of thyne hande with sorow.
" Wherefore yf thou in suretye lyst to stande,
Take Pouerties parte and let prowde Fortune go,
Receyue nothyng that commeth from her hande.
Loue maner and vertue : they be onely tho,
Whiche double Fortune may not take the fro.
Then mayst thou boldly defye her turnyng chaunce :
She can the neyther hynder nor auaunce.
" But and thou wylt nedes medle with her treasure,
Trust not therein, and spende it liberally.
Beare the not proude, nor take not out of measure.
Bylde not thyne house on heyth vp in the skye,
None falleth farre, but he that climbeth hye,
Remember nature sent the hyther bare,
The gyftes of Fortune count them borowed ware."

Thomas More to them that seke Fortune.

" Who so delyteth to prouen and assay,
Of waveryng Fortune the vncertayne lot,
If that the aunswere please you not alway,
Blame ye not me: for I commaunde you not,
Fortune to trust, and eke full well ye wot,
I haue of her no brydle in my fist,
She renneth loose, and turneth where she lyst.
" The rollyng dyse in whom your lucke doth stande,
With whose vnhappy chaunce ye be so wroth,
Ye knowe your selfe came neuer in myne hande.
Lo in this ponde be fyshe and frogges both.
Cast in your nette: but be you liefe or lothe,
Hold you content as Fortune lyst assyne:
For it is your owne fishyng and not myne.
" And though in one chaunce Fortune you offend,
Grudge not there at, but beare a mery face.
In many an other she shall it amende.
There is no manne so farre out of her grace,
But he sometyme hath comfort and solace:
Ne none agayne so farre foorth in her fauour,
That is full satisfyed with her behauiour.
" Fortune is stately, solemne, prowde, and hye:
And rychesse geueth, to haue seruyce therefore.
The nedy begger catcheth an halfpeny:
Some manne a thousande pounde, some lesse, some more.
But for all that she kepeth euer in store,
From euery manne some parcell of his wyll,
That he may pray therfore and serue her styll.
" Some manne hath good, but chyldren hath he none.
Some man hath both, but he can get none health.
Some hath al thre, but vp to honours trone
Can he not crepe by no maner of stelth.
To some she sendeth children, ryches, welthe,
Honour, woorshyp, and reuerence all hys lyfe:
But yet she pyncheth hym with a shrewde wyfe.
" Then for asmuch as it is Fortunes guyse,
To graunt no manne all thyng that he wyll axe,
But as her selfe lyst order and deuyse,
Doth euery manne his parte diuide and tax,
I counsayle you eche one trusse vp your packes,
And take no thyng at all, or be content,
With suche rewarde as fortune hath you sent.
" All thynges in this boke that ye shall rede,
Doe as ye lyst, there shall no manne you bynde,
Them to beleue, as surely as your crede.
But notwithstandyng certes in my mynde,
I durst well swere, as true ye shall them fynde,
In euery poynt eche answere by and by,
As are the iudgementes of astronomye."

The Descripcion of Richard the thirde.

" Richarde the third sonne, of whom we nowe entreate, was in witte and courage egall with either of them, in bodye and prowesse farre vnder them bothe, little of stature, ill fetured of limmes, croke backed, his left shoulder much higher than his right, hard fauoured of visage, and such as is in states called warlye, in other menne otherwise, he was malicious, wrathfull, enuious, and from afore his birth, euer frowarde. It is for trouth reported, that the duches his mother had so much a doe in her trauaile, that shee coulde not bee deliuered of him vncutte: and that hee came into the worlde with the feete forwarde, as menne bee borne outwarde, and (as the fame runneth) also not vntothed, whither menne of hatred reporte aboue the trouthe, or elles that nature chaunged her course in hys beginninge, whiche in the course of his lyfe many thinges vnnaturallye committed. None euill captaine was hee in the warre, as to whiche his disposicion was more metely then for peace. Sundrye victories hadde hee, and sommetime ouerthrowes, but neuer in defaulte as for his owne parsone, either of hardinesse or polytike order, free was hee called of dyspence, and sommewhat aboue hys power liberall, with large giftes hee get him vnstedfaste frendeshippe, for whiche hee was fain to pil and spoyle in other places, and get him stedfast hatred. Hee was close and secrete, a deepe dissimuler, lowlye of counteynaunce, arrogant of heart, outwardly coumpinable where he inwardely hated, not letting to kisse whome hee thoughte to kyll: dispitious and cruell, not for euill will alway, but after for ambicion, and either for the suretie or encrease of his estate. Frende and foo was muche what indifferent, where his aduauntage grew, he spared no mans deathe, whose life withstoode his purpose. He slewe with his owne handes king Henry the sixt, being prisoner in the Tower, as menne constantly saye, and that without commaundement or knoweledge of the king, whiche woulde vndoubtedly, yf he had entended that thinge, haue appointed that boocherly office to some other then his owne borne brother.

" Somme wise menne also weene, that his drift couertly conuayde, lacked not in helping furth his brother of Clarence to his death: whiche hee resisted openly, howbeit somwhat (as menne deme) more faintly then he that wer hartely minded to his welth. And they that thus deme, think that he long time in king Edwardes life, forethought to be king in that case the king his brother (whose life hee looked that euill dyete shoulde shorten) shoulde happen to decease (as in dede he did) while his children wer yonge. And thei deme, that for thys intente he was gladde of his brothers death the duke of Clarence, whose life must nedes haue hindered hym so entendynge, whither the same duke of Clarence, hadde kepte him true to his nephew the yonge king, or enterprised to be kyng himselfe. But of al this pointe, is there no certaintie, and whoso diuineth vppon coniectures, maye as wel shote to farre as to short. Howbeit this haue I by credible informacion learned, that the selfe nighte in whiche kynge Edwarde died, one Mystlebrooke longe ere mornynge, came in greate haste to the house of one Pottyer dwellyng in Reddecrosse strete without Crepulgate: and when he was with hastye rappyng quickly letten in, hee shewed vnto Pottyer that kynge Edwarde was departed. By my trouthe manne quod Pottyer then wyll my mayster the duke of Gloucester bee kynge. What cause hee hadde soo to thynke harde it is to saye, whyther hee being toward him, anye thynge knewe that hee suche thynge purposed, or otherwyse had anye inkelynge thereof: for hee was not likelye to speake it of noughte.

" But nowe to returne to the course of this hystorye, were it that the duke of Gloucester hadde of old fore-minded this conclusion, or was nowe at erste thereunto moued, and putte in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the younge princes, his nephues (as opportunitye and lykelyhoode of spede, putteth a manne in courage of that hee neuer entended) certayn is it that hee contriued theyr destruccion, with the vsurpacion of the regal dignitye vppon hymselfe. And for as muche as hee well wiste and holpe to mayntayn, a long continued grudge and hearte brennynge betwene the quenes kinred and the kinges blood eyther partye enuying others authoritye, he nowe thought that their deuision shoulde bee (as it was in dede) a fortherlye begynnynge to the pursuite of his intente, and a sure ground for the foundacion of al his building yf he might firste vnder the pretext of reuengynge of olde displeasure, abuse the anger and ygnoraunce of the tone partie, to the destruccion of the tother: and then wynne to his purpose as manye as he coulde: and those that coulde not be wonne, myght be loste ere they looked therefore. For of one thynge was hee certayne, that if his entente were perceiued, he shold soone haue made peace betwene the bothe parties, with his owne bloude.

" Kynge Edwarde in his life, albeit that this discencion beetwene hys frendes sommewhat yrked hym : yet in his good health he sommewhat the lesse regarded it, because hee thought whatsoeuer busines shoulde falle betwene them, hymselfe should alwaye bee hable to rule bothe the parties.

" But in his last sicknesse, when hee receiued his naturall strengthe soo sore enfebled, that hee dyspayred all recouerye, then hee consyderynge the youthe of his chyldren, albeit hee nothynge lesse mistrusted then that that happened, yet well forseynge that manye harmes myghte growe by theyr debate, whyle the youth of hys children shoulde lacke discrecion of themself and good counsayle of their frendes, of whiche either party shold counsayle for their owne commodity and rather by pleasaunte aduyse too wynne themselfe fauour, then by profitable aduertisemente to do the children good, he called some of them before him that were at variaunce, and in especyall the lorde marques Dorsette the quenes sonne by her fyrste housebande, and Richarde the lorde Hastynges, a noble man, than lorde chaumberlayne agayne whome the quene specially grudged, for the great fauoure the kyng bare hym, and also for that shee thoughte hym secretely familyer with the kynge in wanton coumpanye. Her kynred also bare hym sore, as well for that the kynge hadde made hym captayne of Calyce (whiche office the lorde Ryuers, brother to the quene, claimed of the kinges former promyse as for diuerse other great giftes which hee receyued, that they loked for. When these lordes with diuerse other of bothe the parties were comme in presence, the kynge liftinge vppe himselfe and vndersette with pillowes, as it is reported on this wyse sayd vnto them, My lordes, my dere kinsmenne and alies, in what plighte I lye you see, and I feele. By whiche the lesse whyle I looke to lyue with you, the more depelye am I moued to care in what case I leaue you, for such as I leaue you, suche bee my children lyke to fynde you. Whiche if they shoulde (that Godde forbydde) fynde you at varyaunce, myght happe to fall themselfe at warre ere their discrecion woulde serue to sette you at peace. Ye se their youthe, of whiche I recken the onely suretie to reste in youre concord. For it suffiseth not that al you loue them, yf eche of you hate other. If they wer menne, your faithfulnesse happelye woulde suffise. But childehood must be maintained by mens authoritye, and slipper youth vnderpropped with elder counsayle, which neither they can haue, but ye geue it, nor ye geue it, yf ye gree not. For wher eche laboureth to breake that the other maketh, and for hatred of ech of others parson, impugneth eche others counsayle, there must it nedes bee long ere anye good conclusion goe forwarde. And also while either partye laboureth to be chiefe, flattery shall haue more place then plaine and faithfull aduyse, of whyche muste needes ensue the euyll bringing vppe of the prynce, whose mynd in tender youth infect, shal redily fal to mischief and riot, and drawe down with this noble realme to ruine, but if grace turn him to wisdom : which if God send, then thei that by euill menes before pleased him best, shal after fall farthest out of fauour, so that euer at length euil driftes dreue to nought, and good plain wayes prosper. Great variaunce hath ther long bene betwene you, not alway for great causes. Sometime a thing right wel intended, our misconstruccion turneth vnto worse or a smal displeasure done vs, eyther our owne affeccion or euil tongues agreueth. But this wote I well ye neuer had so great cause of hatred, as ye haue of loue. That we be al men, that we be christen men, this shall I leaue for prechers to tel you (and yet I wote nere whither any preachers wordes ought more to moue you, then his that is by and by gooying to the place that thei all preache of.) But this shal I desire you to remember, that the one parte of you is of my bloode, the other of myne alies, and eche of yow with other, eyther of kinred or affinitie, whiche spirytuall kynred of affynyty, if the sacramentes of Christes churche, beare that weyghte with vs that woulde Godde thei did, shoulde no lesse moue vs to charitye, then the respecte of fleshlye consanguinitye. Oure Lorde forbydde, that you loue together the worse, for the selfe cause that you ought to loue the better. And yet that happeneth. And no where fynde wee so deadlye debate, as amonge them, whyche by nature and lawe moste oughte to agree together. Suche a pestilente serpente is ambicion and desyre of vaine glorye and soueraintye, whiche amonge states where he once entreth crepeth foorth so farre, tyll with deuision and variaunce hee turneth all to mischiefe. Firste longing to be nexte the best, afterwarde egall with the beste, and at laste chiefe and aboue the beste. Of which immoderate appetite of woorship, and thereby of debate and dissencion what losse, what sorowe, what trouble hathe within these fewe yeares growen in this realme, I praye Godde as well forgeate as wee well remember.

" Whiche thinges yf I coulde as well haue foresene, as I haue with my more payne than pleasure proued, by Goddes blessed Ladie (that was euer his othe) I woulde neuer haue won the courtesye of mennes knees, with the losse of soo many heades. But sithen thynges passed cannot be gaine called, muche oughte wee the more beware, by what occasion we haue taken soo greate hurte afore, that we eftesoones fall not in that occasion agayne. Nowe be those griefes passed, and all is (Godde be thanked) quiete, and likelie righte wel to prosper in wealthfull peace vnder youre coseyns my children, if Godde sende them life and you loue. Of whyche twoo thinges, the lesse losse wer they by whome thoughe Godde dydde hys pleasure, yet shoulde the realme alway finde kinges and paraduenture as good kinges. But yf you among youre selfe in a childes reygne fall at debate, many a good man shall perish and happely he to, and ye to, ere thys land finde peace again. Wherfore in these last wordes that euer I looke to speak with you: I exhort you and require you al, for the loue that you haue euer borne to me, for the loue that I haue euer born to you, for the loue that our Lord beareth to vs all, from this time forwarde, all grieues forgotten, eche of you loue other. Whiche I verelye truste you will, if ye any thing earthly regard, either Godde or your king, affinitie or kinred, this realme, your owne countrey, or your owne surety. And therewithal the king no longer enduring to sitte vp, laide him down on his right side, his face towarde them: and none was there present that coulde refrain from weping. But the lordes recomforting him with as good wordes as they could, and answering for the time as thei thought to stand with his pleasure, there in his presence (as by their wordes appered) ech forgaue other, and ioyned their hands together, when (as it after appeared by their dedes) their hearts wer far a sonder. As sone as the king was departed, the noble prince his sonne drew toward London, which at the time of his decease, kept his houshold at Ludlow in Wales. Which countrey being far of from the law and recourse to iustice, was begon to be farre oute of good wyll and waxen wild, robbers and riuers walking at libertie vncorrected. And for this encheason the prince was in the life of his father sente thither, to the end that the authoritie of his presence, should refraine euill disposed parsons fro the boldnes of their former outerages, to the gouernaunce and ordering of this yong prince at his sending thyther, was there appointed Sir Antony Woduile lord Riuers and brother vnto the quene, a right honourable man, as valiaunte of hande as politike in counsayle. Adioyned wer there vnto him other of the same partie, and in effect euery one as he was nerest of kin vnto the quene, so was planted next about the prince. That drifte by the quene not vnwisely deuised, whereby her bloode mighte of youth be rooted in the princes fauor, the duke of Gloucester turned vnto their destruccion, and vpon that grounde set the foundacion of all his vnhappy building. For whom soeuer he perceiued, either at variance with them, or bearing himself their fauor, hee brake vnto them, some by mouth, som by writing and secret messengers, that it neyther was reason nor in any wise to be suffered, that the yong king their master and kinsmanne, shoold bee in the handes and custodye of his mothers kinred, sequestred in maner from theyr compani and attendance, of which eueri one ought him as faithful seruice as they, and manye of them far more honorable part of kin then his mothers side: whose blood (quod he) sauing the kinges pleasure, was ful vnmetely to be matched with his: whiche nowe to be as who say remoued from the kyng, and the lesse noble to be left aboute him, is (quod he) neither honorable to hys magestie, nor vnto vs, and also to his grace no surety to haue the mightiest of his frendes from him, and vnto vs no little ieopardy, to suffer our welproued euil willers, to grow in ouergret authoritie with the prince in youth, namely which is lighte of beliefe and sone perswaded. Ye remember I trow king Edward himself, albeit he was a manne of age and of discrecion, yet was he in manye thynges ruled by the bende, more then stode either with his honour, or our profite, or with the commoditie of any manne els, except onely the immoderate aduauncement of them selfe. Whiche whither they sorer thirsted after their owne weale, or our woe, it wer hard I wene to gesse. And if some folkes frendship had not holden better place with the king, then any respect of kinred, thei might peraduenture easily haue be trapped and brought to confusion somme of vs ere this. Why not as easily as they haue done some other alreadye, as neere of his royal bloode as we. But our Lord hath wrought his wil, and thanke be to his grace that peril is paste. Howe be it as great is growing, yf wee suffer this yonge kyng in oure enemyes hande, whiche without his wyttyng, might abuse the name of his commaundement, to ani of our vndoing, which thyng God and good prouision forbyd. Of which good prouision none of us hath any thing the lesse nede, for the late made attonemente, in whiche the kinges pleasure hadde more place then the parties willes. Nor none of vs I beleue is so vnwyse, ouersone to truste a newe frende made of an olde foe, or to think that an houerly kindnes, sodainely contract in one houre continued, yet scant a fortnight, shold be deper setled in their stomackes: then a long accustomed malice many yeres rooted.

" With these wordes and writynges and suche other, the duke of Gloucester sone set a fyre, them that were of themself ethe to kindle, and in especiall twayne, Edwarde duke of Buckingham, and Richarde lorde Hastinges and chaumberlayn, both men of honour and of great power. The tone by longe succession from his ancestrie, the tother by his office and the kinges fauor. These two not bearing eche to other so muche loue, as hatred bothe vnto the quenes parte: in this poynte accorded together wyth the duke of Gloucester, that they wolde vtterlye amoue fro the kynges company, all his mothers frendes, vnder the name of their enemyes. Vpon this concluded, the duke of Gloucester vnderstandyng, that the lordes whiche at that tyme were aboute the kyng, entended to bryng him vppe to his coronacion, accoumpanied with suche power of theyr frendes, that it shoulde bee harde for hym to brynge his purpose to passe, without the gathering and great assemble of people and in maner of open warre, whereof the ende he wiste was doubtuous, and in which the kyng being on their side, his part should haue the face and name of a rebellion: he secretly therefore by diuers meanes, caused the quene to be perswaded and brought in the mynd, that it neither wer nede, and also shold be ieopardous, the king to come vp strong. For where as nowe euery lorde loued other, and none other thing studyed vppon, but aboute the coronacion and honoure of the king: if the lordes of her kinred shold assemble in the kinges name muche people, thei should geue the lordes atwixte whome and them hadde bene sommetyme debate, to feare and suspecte, leste they shoulde gather thys people, not for the kynges sauegarde whome no manne empugned, but for theyr destruccion, hauying more regarde to their olde variaunce, then their newe attonement. For whiche cause thei shoulde assemble on the other partie muche people agayne for their defence, whose power she wyste wel farre stretched. And thus should all the realme fall on a rore. And of al the hurte that therof should ensue, which was likely not to be litle, and the most harme there like to fal wher she lest would, all the worlde woulde put her and her kinred in the wyght, and say that thei had vnwyselye, and vntrewlye also, broken the amitie and peace that the kyng her husband so prudentelye made betwene hys kinne and hers in his death bed, and whiche the other party faithfully obserued.

" The quene being in this wise perswaded, suche woorde sente vnto her sonne, and vnto her brother being aboute the kynge, and ouer that the duke of Gloucester hymselfe and other lordes the chiefe of hys bende, wrote vnto the kynge soo reuerentelye, and to the queenes frendes, there soo louyngelye, that they nothynge earthelye mystrustynge, broughte the kynge vppe in greate haste, not in good spede, with a sober coumpanye. Nowe was the king in his waye to London gone, from Northampton, when these dukes of Gloucester and Buckyngham came thither. Where remained behynd, the lorde Ryuers the kynges vncle, entendyng on the morowe to folow the kynge, and bee with hym at Stonye Stratford miles thence, earely or hee departed. So was there made that nyghte muche frendely chere betwene these dukes and the lord Riuers a greate while. But incontinente after that they were oppenlye with greate courtesye departed, and the lorde Riuers lodged, the dukes secretelye, with a fewe of their moste priuye frendes, sette them downe in counsayle, wherin they spent a great parte of the nyght. And at their risinge in the dawnyng of the day, thei sent about priuily to their seruantes in their innes and lodgynges about, geuinge them commaundemente to make them selfe shortely readye, for their lordes wer to horsebackward. Vppon whiche messages, manye of their folke were attendaunt, when manye of the lorde Riuers seruantes were vnreadye. Nowe hadde these dukes taken also into their custodye the kayes of the inne, that none shoulde passe foorth without theyr licence.

" And ouer this in the hyghe waye towarde Stonye Stratforde where the kynge laye, they hadde beestowed certayne of theyr folke, that shoulde send backe agayne, and compell to retourne, anye manne that were gotten oute of Northampton toward Stonye Stratforde, tyll they should geue other lycence. For as muche as the dukes themselfe entended for the shewe of theire dylygence, to bee the fyrste that shoulde that daye attende vppon the kynges highnesse out of that towne: thus bare they folke in hande. But when the lorde Ryuers vnderstode the gates closed, and the wayes on euerye side besette, neyther hys seruauntes nor hymself suffered to go oute, parceiuyng well so greate a thyng without his knowledge not begun for noughte, comparyng this maner present with this last nightes chere, in so few houres so gret a chaunge marueylouslye misliked. How be it sithe hee coulde not geat awaye, and keepe himselfe close, hee woulde not, leste he shoulde seeme to hyde himselfe for some secret feare of his owne faulte, whereof he saw no such cause in hym self: he determined vppon the suretie of his own conscience, to goe boldelye to them, and inquire what thys matter myghte meane. Whome as soone as they sawe, they beganne to quarrell with hym, and saye, that hee intended to sette distaunce beetweene the kynge and them, and to brynge them to confusion, but it shoulde not lye in hys power. And when hee beganne (as hee was a very well spoken manne) in goodly wise to excuse himself, they taryed not the ende of his aunswere, but shortely tooke him and putte him in warde, and that done, foorthwyth wente to horsebacke, and tooke the waye to Stonye Stratforde. Where they founde the kinge with his companie readye to leape on horsebacke, and departe forwarde, to leaue that lodging for them, because it was to streighte for bothe coumpanies. And as sone as they came in his presence, they lighte adowne with all their companie aboute them. To whome the duke of Buckingham saide, goe afore gentlemenne and yeomen, kepe youre rowmes. And thus in goodly arraye, thei came to the kinge, and on theire knees in very humble wise, salued his grace; whiche receyued them in very ioyous and amiable maner, nothinge earthlye knowing nor mistrustinge as yet. But euen by and by in his presence, they piked a quarell to the lorde Richard Graye, the kynges other brother by his mother, sayinge that hee with the lorde marques his brother and the lorde Riuers his vncle, hadde coumpassed to rule the kinge and the realme, and to sette variaunce among the states, and to subdewe and destroye the noble blood of the realm. Toward the accoumplishinge whereof, they sayde that the lorde Marques hadde entered into the Tower of London, and thence taken out the kinges treasor, and sent menne to the sea. All whiche thinge these dukes wiste well were done for good purposes and necessari by the whole counsaile at London, sauing that sommewhat thei must sai. Vnto whiche woordes, the king aunswered, what my brother Marques hath done I cannot saie. But in good faith I dare well aunswere for myne vncle Riuers and my brother here, that thei be innocent of any such matters. Ye my liege quod the duke of Buckingham thei haue kept theire dealing in these matters farre fro the knowledge of your good grace. And foorthwith thei arrested the lord Richarde and Sir Thomas Waughan knighte, in the kinges presence, and broughte the king and all backe vnto Northampton, where they tooke againe further counsaile. And there they sent awaie from the kinge whom it pleased them, and sette newe seruantes aboute him, suche as lyked better them than him. At which dealinge hee wepte and was nothing contente, but it booted not. And at dyner the duke of Gloucester sente a dishe from his owne table to the lord Riuers, prayinge him to bee of good chere, all should be well inough. And he thanked the duke, and prayed the messenger to beare it to his nephewe the lorde Richard with the same message for his comfort, who he thought had more nede of comfort, as one to whom such aduersitie was straunge. But himself had been al his dayes in vre therewith, and therfore coulde beare it the better. But for al this coumfortable courtesye of the duke of Gloucester, he sent the lord Riuers and the lorde Richarde with Sir Thomas Vaughan into the Northe countrey into diuers places to prison, and afterward al to Pomfrait, where they were in conclusion beheaded."

A letter written with a cole by Sir THOMAS MORE to hys doughter maistres MARGARET ROPER, within a whyle after he was prisoner in the Towre.

" Myne own good doughter, our Lorde be thanked I am in good helthe of bodye, and in good quiet of minde: and of worldly thynges I no more desyer then I haue. I beseche hym make you all mery in the hope of heauen. And such thynges as I somewhat longed to talke with you all, concerning the worlde to come, our Lorde put theim into your myndes, as I truste he dothe, and better to, by hys holy Spirite: who blesse you and preserue you all. Written wyth a cole by your tender louing father, who in hys pore prayers forgetteth none of you all, nor your babes, nor your nurses, nor your good husbandes, nor your good husbandes shrewde wyues, nor your fathers shrewde wyfe neither, nor our other frendes. And thus fare ye hartely well for lacke of paper.

" THOMAS MORE, knight."

Two short ballettes which Sir THOMAS MORE made for hys pastime while he was prisoner in the Tower of London.

LEWYS the lost louer.

" Ey flatering fortune, loke thou neuer so fayre,
Or neuer so plesantly begin to smile,
As though thou wouldst my ruine all repayre,
During my life thou shalt me not begile.
Trust shall I God, to entre in a while
Hys hauen or heauen, sure and vniforme.
Euer after thy calme, loke I for a storme."

DAVY the dycer.

" Long was I, lady Lucke, your seruing man,
And now haue lost agayne all that I gat,
Wherfore whan I thinke on you nowe and than,
And in my mynde remember this and that,
Ye may not blame me though I beshrew your cat,
But in fayth I blesse you agayne a thousand times,
For lending me now some laysure to make rymes."

At the same time with Sir Thomas More lived Skelton, the poet laureate of Henry VIII. from whose works it seems proper to insert a few stanzas, though he cannot be said to have attained great elegance of language.

[Erasmus pronounced Skelton " the light and ornament of English scholars." He was an ecclesiastick ; principally distinguished, however, by his propensity to satire. If, as Dr. Johnson says, he did not attain great elegance of language, he however possessed great knowledge of it. From his works may be drawn an abundance of terms, which were then in use among the vulgar as well as the learned ; and which by no other writer of his time are so obviously (and often so wittily) illustrated. At the same time he was frequently coarse and illiberal. The works of Skelton are, as yet, most incorrectly printed.]

The Prologue to the Bouge of Courte.

" In Autumpne whan the sonne in vyrgyne
By radyante hete enryped hath our corne ;
Whan Luna, full of mutabylyte,
As emperes the dyademe hath worne
Of our pole artyke, smylynge halfe in scorne
At our foly, and our vnstedfastnesse,
The time whan Mars to warre hym dyd dres ;
" I callynge to mynde the greate auctoryte
Of poetes olde, whiche full craftely
Vnder as couerte termes as coulde be
Can touche a trouth, and cloke subtylly
With fresshe vtteraunce full sentencyously
Dyuerse in style ; some spared not vyce to wryte,
Some of mortalitie nobly dyd endyte ;
" Whereby, I rede, theyr renome and theyr fame
Maye neuer dye, but euermore endure ;
I was sore moued to aforse the same :
But ignoraunce full soone dyde me dyscure,
And shewed that in this arte I was not sure ;

For to illumine she sayd I was to dulle,
Aduysynge me my penne awaye to pulle
" And not to wryte, for he so wyll atteyne
Exceedyng ferther than his connynge is ;
His heed maye be harde, but feble his brayne :
Yet haue I knowen suche er this.
But of reproche surely he maye not mys,
That clymmeth hyer than he may fotinge haue,
What and he slyde downe, who shall him saue ?
" Thus vp and downe my mynde was drawen and cast,
That I ne wyste what to do was beste,
So sore enwered, that I was at the laste
Enforsed to slepe, and for to take some reste,
And to lye downe as soone as I me dreste,
At Harwyche porte slumbrynge as I laye
In myne hostes house called Powers keye."

[Section XVII. Lord Surrey. Sir Thomas Wyat. N. Grimoald. Songs and Sonnets of uncertain Authors.]

Of the wits that flourished in the reign of Henry VIII. none have been more frequently celebrated than the earl of Surrey; and this history would therefore have been imperfect without some specimens of his works, which yet it is not easy to distinguish from those of Sir Thomas Wyat and others, with which they are confounded in the edition that has fallen into my hands. The three first are, I believe, Surrey's; the rest, being of the same age, are selected, some as examples of different measures, and one as the oldest composition which I have found in blank verse.

[Dr. Johnson is right in considering the first, second, and third, of the following poems, as compositions of lord Surrey. Of these I have corrected the text by means of a recent edition of this nobleman's works, which has been formed with great accuracy as well as elegance by the Rev. Dr. Nott, prebendary of Winchester. For the rest, the two ballads are the productions of uncertain authors; and the death of Zoroas was written by Nicholas Grimoald, chaplain to the martyr Ridley. The edition, to which Dr. Johnson resorted, was that of 1557. The specimen of blank verse, which Grimoald's poem exhibits, is not the oldest composition of this kind, which it appeared to be to Dr. Johnson; but is the second; lord Surrey having preceded him in breaking the shackles of rhyme. There is much beauty, both in the diction and cadences, in this citation from Grimoald.]

Description of Spring, wherein eche thing renewes, save only the lover.

" The soote season that bud and bloome fourth bringes,
With grene hath cladde the hyll, and eke the vale,
The nightingall with fethers new she singes;
The turtle to her mate hath told her tale:
Somer is come, for every spray now springes,
The hart hath hunge hys olde head on the pale,
The bucke in brake his winter coate he flynges:
The fishes flete with newe repayred scale:
The adder all her slough away she flynges;
The swift swallow pursueth the flyes smale,
The busy bee her honey now she mynges;
Winter is worne that was the floures bale.
And thus I see among these pleasant thynges
Eche care decayes, and yet my sorrow sprynges."

Descripcion of the restless estate of a lover.

" When youth had led me half the race,
That Cupides scourge had made me runne;
I looked back to mete the place,
From whence my weary course begunne:
" And then I saw howe my desyre
By guiding ill had lett my waye;
Myne eyne, to greedy of theyre hyre,
Had made me lose a better prey.
" For when in sighes I spent the day,
And could not cloake my grief with game;
The boyling smoke dyd still bewray
The persant heat of secret flame:
" And when salt teares did bayne my breast,
Where love his pleasant traynes had sown,
The fruit thereof the fruytes opprest,
Or that the buddes were spronge and blowne.
" And when myne eyen dyd still pursue
The flying chase of theyre request;
Theyre greedy looks dyd oft renew
The hydden wounde within my breste.
" When every loke these cheeks might stayne,
From dedly pale to glowing red;
By outward signes appeared playne,
The wo wherewith my hart was fed.
" But all to late Love learneth me
To paynt all kynd of colours new;
To blynd theyre eyes that else should see
My sparkled chekes with Cupids hew.
" And now the covert brest I clame,
That worships Cupide secretely;
And nourisheth hys sacred flame,
From whence no blasing sparks do flye."

Descripcion of the fickle Affections, Pangs, and Sleightes of Love.

" Such wayward wayes hath Love, that most in part discord
Our willes do stand, whereby our hartes but seldom do accord:
Deceyte is hys delighte, and to begyle and mocke
The simple hartes which he doth strike with froward divers stroke.
He causeth th' one to rage with golden burning darte,
And doth alay, with leaden cold, again the others harte.
Whose gleames of burning fyre, and easy sparkes of flame,
In balance of unequal weyght he pondereth by ame.
From easye ford, where I myghte wade and pass full well,
He me withdrawes and doth me drive into a dark depe hell:
And me witholdes where I am calde and offred place,
And willes, that still my mortal foe I do beseke of grace;
And lettes me to pursue a conquest welnere wonne
To follow where my paynes were spilt, ere that my sute begunne.
Lo, by these rules I know how soon a hart may turne
From warre to peace, from truce to stryfe, and so agayne returne.
I know how to convert my will in others lust,
Of little stuffe unto my self to weave a webbe of trust:
And how to hyde my harme with soft dyssembled chere,
When in my face the painted thoughtes would outwardly appeare.
I know how that the bloud forsakes the face for dred,
And how by shame it staynes agayne the chekes with flamyng red:
I know under the grene the serpent how he lurkes:
The hammer of the restless forge I wote eke how it workes.
I know and can by roate the tale that I would tell;
But ofte the woordes come fourth awrye of him that loveth well.
I know in heate and colde the lover how he shakes,
In synging how he can complayne, in sleeping how he wakes.
To languish without ache, sickelesse for to consume,
A thousand thynges for to devyse, resolvynge all in fume;
And though he lyste to see his ladyes grace full sore
Such pleasure as delyghts his eye doth not his helthe restore.
I know to seke the tracte of my desyred foe,
And fere to fynde that I do seek: but chiefly this I know;

That lovers must transfourme into the thynge beloved,
And live (alas! who could believe?) with sprite from lyfe removed.
I knowe in harty sighes and laughters of the spleene,
At once to chaunge my state, my will, and eke my colour clene.
I know how to deceyve my self withouten helpe,
And how the lyon chastised is, by beatynge of the whelpe.
In standynge nere the fyre, I know how that I freese;
Farre of I burne, in both I waste, and so my lyfe I leese.
I know how Love doth rage upon a yeylden mynde,
How smalle a nete may take and meash a harte of gentle kynde:
With seldom tasted swete to season hepes of gall,
Revived with a glynt of grace old sorrowes to let fall.
The hydden traynes I know, and secret snares of Love,
How soone a loke may prynte a thoughte that never will remove.
The slypper state I know, the sodein turnes from welthe,
The doubtfull hope, the certain wooe, and sure despair of helthe."

A praise of his ladie.

"Geve place you ladies and be gone,
Boast not your selves at all,
Fore here at hande approcheth one,
Whose face will stayne you all.
"The vertue of her lively lookes
Excels the precious stone,
I wishe to have none other bookes
To reade or look upon.
"In eche of her two christall eyes,
Smyleth a naked boy;
It would you all in heart suffise
To see that lampe of joye.
"I think nature hath loste the moulde,
Where she her shape did take;
Or else I doubte if nature coulde
So fayre a creature make.
"She may be well comparde
Unto the Phenix kinde,
Whose like was never seene nor heard,
That any man can fynde.
"In lyfe she is Diana chast,
In trouth Penelopey,
In woord and eke in dede stedfast;
What will you more we say?
"If all the world were sought so farre,
Who could finde suche a wight?
Her beauty twinkleth lyke a starre
Within the frosty night."

The Lover, refused of his love, embraceth vertue.

"My youthfull yeres are past,
My joyfull dayes are gone.
My lyfe it may not last,
My grave and I am one.
"My myrth and joyes are fled,
And I a man in wo,
Desirous to be ded,
My misciefe to forgo.
"I burne and am a colde,
I freese amyddes the fyer,
I see she doth witholde
That is my honest desyre.
"I see my helpe at hande,
I see my lyfe also,
I see where she doth stande
That is my deadly fo.
"I see how she doth see,
And yet she wil be blynde,
I see in helpyng me,
She sekes and wil not fynde.
"I see how she doth wrye,
When I begynne to mone,
I see when I come nye,
How fayne she would be gone.
"I see what wil ye more?
She will me gladly kill,
And you shall see therfore
That she shall have her will.
"I cannot live with stones,
It is too hard a foode,
I wil be dead at ones
To do my Lady good."

The Death of Zoroas, an Egiptian astronomer, in the first fight that Alexander had with the Persians.

" Now clattring armes, now raging broyls of warre,
Gan passe the noys of dredfull trumpetts clang,
Shrowded with shafts, the heaven with cloude of dartes,
Covered the ayre. Against full fatted bulles,
As forceth kyndled yre the lyons keene,
Whose greedy gutts the gnawing hunger prickes;
So Macedons against the Persians fare,
Now corpses hyde the purpurde soyle with blood;
Large slaughter on eche side, but Perses more,
Moyst fieldes bebled, theyr heartes and numbers bate,
Fainted while they gave backe, and fall to flighte.
The litening Macedon by swordes, by gleaves,
By bandes and troupes of footemen, with his garde,
Spedes to Dary, but hym his merest kyn,
Oxate preserves with horsemen on a plumpe
Before his carr, that none his charge should give.
Here grunts, here groans, eche where strong youth is spent;
Shaking her bloudy hands, Bellone among
The Perses soweth all kind of cruel death:
With throte yrent he roares, he lyeth along
His entrailes with a launce through gryded quyte,
Hym smytes the club, hym woundes farre stryking bowe,
And him the sling, and him the shining sword;
He dyeth, he is all dead, he pantes, he restes.
Right over stoode in snowwhite armour brave,
The Memphite Zoroas, a cunnyng clarke,
To whom the heaven lay open as his booke;
And in celestiall bodies he could tell
The moving meeting light, aspect, eclips,
And influence and constellations all;
What earthly chaunces would betyde, what yere,
Of plenty storde, what signe forewarned death,
How winter gendreth snow, what temperature
In the prime tyde doth season well the soyle,
Why summer burnes, why autumne hath ripe grapes,
Whither the circle quadrate may become,
Whether our tunes heavens harmony can yelde,
Of four begyns among themselves how great
Proportion is; what sway the erryng lightes
Doth send, in course gayne that fyrst movyng heaven;
What grees one from another distant be,
What starr doth lett the hurtfull syre to rage,
Or hym more mylde what opposition makes,
What fyre doth qualifye Mavorses fyre,
What house eche one doth seeke, what plannett raignes
Within this heaven sphere, nor that small thynges
I speake, whole heaven he closeth in his brest.
This sage then in the starres hath spyed the fates
Threatned him death without delay; and sith
He saw he could not fatall order chaunge,
Foreward he prest in battayle, that he might

Mete with the rulers of the Macedons.
Of his right hand desirous to be slain,
The bouldest borne, and worthiest in the feilde;
And as a wight, now wery of his lyfe,
And seking death, in fyrst front of his rage,
Comes desperately to Alexanders face,
At him with dartes one after other throwes,
With recklesse wordes and clamour him provokes,
And sayth, Nectanaks bastard shamefull stayne
Of mothers bed, why losest thou thy strokes,
Cowardes among? Turn thee to me, in case
Manhood there be so much left in thy heart,
Come fight with me, that on my helmet weare
Apollos laurell both for learninges laude,
And eke for martiall praise, that in my shielde
The seven fold Sophie of Minerve contein,
A match more mete, Syr King, then any here.
The noble prince amoved takes ruth upon
The wilfull wight, and with soft words ayen,
O monstrous man (quoth he) what so thou art,
I pray thee live, ne do not with thy death
This lodge of Lore, the Muses mansion marre;
That treasure house this hand shall never spoyle,
My sword shall never bruise that skilfull brayne,
Long gatherd heapes of science sone to spill;
O how fayre fruites may you to mortall men
From Wisdoms garden give; how many may
By you the wiser and the better prove:
What error, what mad moode, what frenzy thee
Perswades to be downe sent to depe Averne,
Where no artes flourish, nor no knowledge vailes
For all these sawes. When thus the sovereign said,
Alighted Zoroas, with sword unsheathed,
The careless king there smoate above the greve,
At th' opening of his quishes wounded him,
So that the blood down trailed on the ground:
The Macedon perceiving hurt, gan gnashe,
But yet his mynde he bent in any wise
Hym to forbeare, sett spurrs unto his stede,
And turnde away, lest anger of his smarte
Should cause revenger hand deale balefull blowes.
But of the Macedonian chieftaines knights,
One Meleager could not bear this sight,
But ran upon the said Egyptian rude,
And cutt him in both knees: he fell to ground,
Wherewith a whole rout came of souldiours sterne,
And all in pieces hewed the sely seg:
But happely the soule fled to the starres,
Where, under him, he hath full sight of all,
Whereat he gazed here with reaching looke.
The Persians waild such sapience to forgoe,
The very fone the Macedonians wisht
He would have lived, king Alexander selfe
Demde him a man unmete to dye at all;
Who wonne like praise for conquest of his yre,

As for stoute men in field that day subdued,
Who princes taught how to discerne a man,
That in his head so rare a jewel beares;
But over all those same Camenes, those same,
Divine Camenes, whose honour he procurde,
As tender parent doth his daughters weale,
Lamented, and for thankes, all that they can,
Do cherish hym deceast, and sett him free,
From dark oblivion of devouring death."

[SECTION XVIII. Sir Thomas Elyot. Leland. Bale. Archbishop Cranmer.]

[The reign of our eighth Henry abounded with learned men; and I will close it with some of those to whom our literature is in a higher degree indebted, than to the poetical wits adduced by Dr. Johnson. I therefore select Sir Thomas Elyot, Leland, Bale, and Archbishop Cranmer.

Sir Thomas Elyot was a writer, who contributed much towards the improvement of the language. So early as in 1538 he had published a Dictionary declaring Latin by English. He wrote also upon the Education of Children. His Castle of Health, and his Governor, are works by which he has been most distinguished. From the latter, which was first published in 1544, I copy his descriptions of Affability and Mercy.

"Of Affabilitie, and the utilitie thereof in every estate. B. 2. cap. 5.

"Affabilitie is of wounderfull efficacye or power in procuring love. And it is in sundry wise, but most properly, where a man is facile or easy to be spoken unto. It is also where a man speaketh courteysly, with a sweet speach or countenance; wherwith the hearers (as it were with a delycate odour) be refreshed and allured to love him, in whome is thys moste delectable qualitie. As contrariewyse, men vehemently hate them, that have a prowde and hautie countenaunce, be they never so high in estate or degree. How often have I hearde people say, when men in great authoritie have passed by without making gentyll countenaunce to those which have done to them reverence, 'Thys man weeneth with a looke to subdue all the worlde! Nay, nay; mens heartes be free, and will love whom they lyst.' And therto all the other do consent in a murmure, as it were bees."

"That a Governour ought to be mercyfull, &c. B. 2. cap. 7.

"Mercy is and hath beene ever of such estimation with mankinde, that not onelye reason perswadeth, but also experience proveth, that in whome mercy lacketh and is not founden, in him all other vertues be drowned, and lose their just commendation. The vice called crueltie, whyche is contrary to mercy, is by good reason most odious of all other vices; inasmuche as like a poison, or continuall pestilence, it destroyeth the generation of man. Also, lykewise as noryshing meates and drinkes in a sicke bodye doe lose their bountie, and augmenteth malady; semblably, divers vertues in a person cruell and malicious be not onely obfuscate or hid, but do minyster occasyon and assistence to crueltie.

"But nowe to speake of the inestimable price and value of mercy. Lette governours, whych knowe that they have received their power from above, revolve in their myndes in what perylle they themselfe be dailye, if in God were not abundance of mercy."

Leland was an ecclesiastick, and the king's librarian. He was commissioned by Henry to investigate the antiquities, and examine the records, of the whole kingdom. From his report to the king the following extract is made.

"(q) That profyt hath rysen by the aforsayd journeye, in bryngynge full manye thynges to light, as concernynge the usurped autoryte of the byshopp of Rome and hys complyces, to the manyfest and vyolent derogacyon of kyngely dygnyte, I referre my selfe moste humbly to your moste prudent, lerned, and hygh judgement, to descerne my dylygence in the longe volume, wherin I have made answer for the defence of your supreme dygnyte; alonly lenynge to the stronge pyllour of holye scripture agaynste the whole college of the Romanystes, clokynge their crafty assercyons and argumentes undre the name of one poore Pighius of Ultrajecte in Germany, and standynge to them as to their onlye anker-holde agaynst tempestes that they knowe wyll aryse, yf truthe maye be by lycens lette in, to have a voyce in the generall counsell. Yet herein only I have not pytched the supreme work of my labour, wherunto your grace, moste lyke a kyngelye patrone of all good learnynge, did anymate me. But also consyderynge and expendynge with my selfe, how great a numbre of excellent godly wyttes and wryters, learned with the best, as the tymes served, hath bene in thys your regyon, not onely at suche tymes as the Romane emprours had recourse to it, but also in those dayes that the Saxons prevayled of the Brytaynes, and the Normannes of the Saxons; coulde not but, with a fervent zele and an honest corage, commende them to memory: els alas, lyke to have bene perpetually obscured, or to have bene lyghtelye remembred, as uncerteyne shaddowes. Wherfor I knowynge, by infynyte varyete of bokes and assyduouse readynge of them, who hath bene learned and who hath written from tyme to tyme in this realme, have digested into iiij bokes the names of them with their lyves and monumentes of learnynge."

Bale was bishop of Ossory; a man of great learning, and a bitter enemy of the papists. The following citation, from one of his numerous labours, is extremely curious, as it respects our literary history at the beginning of our Reformation.

"(r) Never had we bene offended for the losse of our lybraryes, beynge so many in nombre, and in so desolate places for the more parte, yf the chiefe monumentes and moste notable workes of our excellent wryters had bene reserved. If there had bene in every shyre of Englande but one solempne lybrary, to the preservacyon of those noble workes, and preferrement of good lernynges in oure posteryte, it had bene yet sumwhat. But to destroye all without consyderacyon, is and wyll be unto Englande for ever a moste horryble infamy, amonge the grave senyours of other nacyons. A greate nombre of them, which purchased those superstycyouse mansyons, reserved of those lybrarye bokes some to serve theyr jakes, some to scour theyr candelstyckes, and some to rubbe their bootes. Some they solde to the grossers and sope-sellers, and some they sent over see to the bokebynders, not in small nombre, but at tymes whole shyppes full, to the wonderynge of the foren nacyons. Yea, the unyversytees of this realme are not all clere in this detestable fact. But cursed is that bellye, whyche seketh to be fedde with soche ungodly gaynes, and so depelye shameth hys natural contreye. I knowe a merchaunt man, which shall at thys tyme be namelesse, that boughte the contentes of two noble lybraryes for xl shyllynges pryce, a shame it is to be spoken. Thys stuffe hath he occupyed in the stede of graye paper by the space of more than these x yeares, and yet he hath store ynough for as many yeares to come. A prodygyouse example is this, and to be abhorred of all men which love their nacyon as they shoulde do."

But among those, who "by their knowledge of learning were then meet for the people," of most eminent distinction was Archbishop Cranmer. It has been lately well observed, by Dr. Laurence, that he is always clear and flowing, eloquent and impressive; that his diction has a certain unobtrusive elegance about it, which mocks description. Bishop Burnet has rashly pronounced the style of Cranmer as unconnected; which he certainly could not have done, if he had read with attention the compositions of the primate. He must have also forgotten the share which Cranmer had in the composition, called the Institution of a Christian Man, noted for the purity of its style; and in the production of our Liturgy, than which a specimen of more refined and dignified language will not easily be found. What can be more perspicuous, and at the same time deeply impressive, than the style in which Cranmer speaks of one of his labours, and addresses his readers?

"(s) The Lorde graunt, that this my travayle and labour in his vineyard be not in vayne; but that it may prosper, and bring forth good fruites to his honoure and glory. For when I see his vyneyarde overgrowen with thornes, brambles, and weedes, I knowe that everlasting wo appertayneth unto me, if I holde my peace, and put not to my handes and tongue, to labour in pourgyng his vineyard. God I take to wytnesse, who seeth the heartes of all menne thoroughly unto the bottome, that I take this laboure for none other consideration but for the glory of his name, and the discharge of my dutie, and the zeale that I beare towarde the flocke of Christ. I know in what office God hath placed me, and to what pourpose; that is to saye, to set forthe his worde trewly unto his people, to the uttermost of my power, withoute respecte of personne, or regarde of thynge in the worlde, but of hym alone. I knowe what accompte I shall make to hym hereof at the laste daye, when every manne shall aunswere for his vocation, and receyve for the same good or ill, accordynge as he hath done. I knowe how Antichriste hath obscured the glory of God, and the trewe knowledge of his word, overcastyng the same with mystes and cloudes of errour and ignorance, through false gloses and interpretations. It pitieth me to see the simple and hungry flocke of Christe ledde into corrupt pastures, to be caryed blindfelde they knowe not whither, and to be fedde with poyson in the steede of holsome meates. And moved by the duetie, office, and place, whereunto it hath pleased God to call me, I geve warnynge in his name unto all that professe Christe, that they flee farre from Babylon, if they wyll save their soules; and to beware of that great harlot, that is to say, the pestiferous see of Rome, that she make you not drunke with her pleasaunte wyne. Truste not her sweete promyses, nor bankette not with her; for instede of wine she will geve you sour dregges, and for meate she will feede you with ranke poyson. But come to oure Redeemer and Saviour Christ, who refresheth all that trewely come unto hym, be theyr anguish and hevynesse never so greate. Geve credite unto hym, in whose mouthe was never founde guyle, nor untruthe. By hym you shall be clearely delyvered from all your diseases: of hym you shall have full remission à pœnâ et à culpâ. He it is that feedeth contynually all, that belong unto hym, with his owne fleshe that hanged upon the crosse; and gyveth them drynke of the bloud flowynge out of his owne syde; and maketh to sprynge within them water that floweth unto everlastynge lyfe. Lysten not to the false incantations, sweet whisperinges, and crafty jugglynges of the subtyll Papystes; wherewith they have this many years deluded and bewytched the worlde. But hearken to Christe; gyve eare unto his wordes, which shall leade you the ryght waye unto everlastynge lyfe, there with hym to lyve ever as heyres of hys kyngdome. Amen."

This composition brings us to the reign of Edward the sixth, in which no writer, that may be compared with Cranmer, occurs.]

[Section XIX. Dr. Wilson.]

About the year 1553 wrote (t) Dr. Wilson, a man celebrated for the politeness of his style, and the extent of his knowledge: what was the state of our language in his time, the following may be of use to show.

" Pronunciation is an apte orderinge bothe of the voyce, countenaunce, and all the whole bodye, accordynge to the worthines of suche woordes and mater as by speache are declared. The vse hereof is suche for anye one that liketh to haue prayse for tellynge his tale in open assemblie, that hauing a good tongue, and a comelye countenaunce, he shal be thought to passe all other that haue the like vtteraunce: thoughe they haue much better learning. The tongue geueth a certayne grace to euerye matter, and beautifieth the cause in like maner, as a swete soundynge lute muche setteth forthe a meane deuised ballade. Or as the sounde of a good instrumente styrreth the hearers, and moueth muche delite, so a cleare soundyng voice comforteth muche our deintie eares with much swete melodie, and causeth vs to allowe the matter rather for the reporters sake, then the reporter for the matters sake. Demosthenes therfore, that famouse oratour, beyng asked what was the chiefest point in al oratorie, gaue the chiefe and onely praise to Pronunciation; being demaunded, what was the seconde, and the thirde, he stil made answere, Pronunciation, and would make none other aunswere, till they lefte askyng, declarying hereby that arte without vtteraunce can dooe nothyng, vtteraunce without arte can dooe right muche. And no doubte that man is in outwarde apparaunce halfe a good clarke, that hath a cleane tongue, and a comely gesture of his body. Æschines lykwyse beyng bannished his countrie through Demosthenes, when he had redde to the Rhodians his own oration, and Demosthenes aunswere thereunto, by force whereof he was bannished, and all they marueiled muche at the excellencie of the same: then (quod Æschines) you would have marueiled muche more if you had heard hymselfe speak it. Thus beyng cast in miserie and bannished for euer, he could not but geue such great reporte of his deadly and mortal enemy."

(t) [The extract, made by Dr. Johnson, is from Wilson's Art of Rhetorick; which has been considered, and justly, I believe, the first system of regular criticism in our language. Wilson was a fellow of King's College, Cambridge.]

[With Wilson, and the following remark, Dr. Johnson closes his history: "Thus have I deduced the English language from the age of Alfred to that of Elizabeth; in some parts imperfectly for want of materials; but I hope, at least, in such a manner that its progress may be easily traced, and the gradations observed, by which it advanced from its first rudeness to its present elegance."]

[Section XX. Writers contemporary with Wilson. Notices of eminent Writers, from the time of queen Elizabeth to the present.]

[For the harvest of good writing, which arose in the time of Elizabeth, Ascham, Sir Thomas Smith, and Sackville lord Buckhurst, contemporaries of Wilson, contributed to prepare the soil. Of their works a specimen, for the purposes of comparison, may here be proper.

The work of Wilson was published in the reign of Edward the sixth: that of Ascham a little before the commencement of it, and republished in the earlier part of Elizabeth's. This is the Toxophilus, or School of Shooting; from the preface to which the following extract is made.

"If any man would blame me, eyther for takinge such a matter in hande, or els for wrytinge it in the English tongue, this aunswere I may make him, that when the best of the realme thincke it honest for them to use, I, one of the meanest sorte, ought not to suppose it vile for me to wryte: and thoughe to have written it in another tongue, had bene both more profitable for my study, and also more honest for my name, yet I can thinke my laboure well bestowed, if with a little hindrance of my profite and name, may come any furtherance to the pleasure or commodity of the gentlemen and yomen of Englande, for whose sake I toke this matter in hand. And as for the Latine or Greeke tongue, everye thinge is so excellentlye done in them, that none can do better: In the Englishe tongue, contrary, everye thinge in a maner so meanlye both for the matter and handelinge, that no man can do worse. For therein the least learned, for the most part, have bene alwayes most readye to write. And they which had least hope in Latine, have bene most bould in Englishe: when surelye everye man that is most readye to talke, is not most able to write. He that will write well in any tongue, must follow this counsel of Aristotle, to speake as the comon people do, to thinke as wyse men do: as so shoulde everye man understand him, and the judgement of wyse men alowe him. Manye Englishe writers have not done so, but usinge straunge wordes, as Latine, Frenche, and Italian, do make all thinges darke and harde. Ones I communed with a man which reasoned the Englishe tongue to be enriched and encreased thereby, sayinge: 'Who will not prayse that feast where a man shall drincke 'at a dinner both wyne, ale, and beere?' 'Truly (quoth I) they be al good, every one taken by 'himselfe alone, but if you put malvesye and sacke, redde wyne and white, ale and beere and al 'in one pot, you shall make a drincke not easye to be knowen, nor yet holsome for the bodye.' Cicero, in folowing Isocrates, Plato, and Demosthenes, encreased the Latine tongue after another sort. This way, because divers men that wryte, do not know, they can neyther folow it, because of theyr ignoraunce, nor yet will prayse it for over arrogancye, two faultes, seldome the one out of the others companye. Englishe writers, by diversity of time, have taken dyvers matters in hand. In our fathers time no thinge was read but bookes of fayned chevalrie, wherein a man by readinge shoulde be led to none other ende, but onely to manslaughter and baudrye. If anye man suppose they were good enough to passe the time with all, he is deceived. For surely vaine wordes do worke no small thinge in vaine, ignorant, and younge mindes, especially if they be geven any thinge thereunto of their owne nature. These bookes (as I have heard say) were made the most part in abbayes, and monasteries, a very likely and fit fruite of such an ydle and blind kind of lyving. In our tyme now, when every man is geven to know, much rather than to live wel, very many do write, but after such a fashion as very many do shoote. Some shooters take in hande stronger bowes, than they be able to maintaine. This thinge maketh them some time to over shoote the marke, some time to shoote far wyde, and perchaunce hurt some that looke on."

From these curious remarks on our language and literature we proceed to the notice of Sir Thomas Smith, who is said to have been "(u) a great refiner of the English writing," which at the time of his attempt, in 1542, is called "(v) too rough and unpolished." Accordingly his Orations on the proposed marriage of Elizabeth, have been considered as "(w) notable specimens of oratory and history." The encomium is too high. But a citation shall be given.

"(x) The Danes enjoyed once this realm too long. Of which although some of them were born here, yet so long as the Danes blood was in them, they could never but favour the poor and barren realm of Denmark more than the rich country of England.

"The Normans after wan and possessed the realm. So long as ever the memory of their blood remained, the first most, and so less and less, as by little and little they grew to be English, what did they? keep down the English nation, magnifie the Normans; the rich abbies and priories they gave to their Normans; the chief holds, the noble seignories, the best bishopricks, and all. Yea, they went so low as to the parsonages and vicarages; if one were better to the purse than another, that a Norman had. Poor English men were glad to take their leavings. And so much was our nation kept under, that we were glad to dissemble our tongue, and learn theirs; whereupon came the proverb, Jack would be a gentleman if he could speak French."

We come now to a composition of particular importance in the history of our language, the first regular drama. This is the tragedy of Gorboduc written by Thomas Sackville, lord Buckhurst, when he was young; and supposed by Mr. Warton to have been finished early in the reign of Mary. It was printed surreptitiously, and inaccurately, in 1565; correctly, in 1571. I select a speech of Gorboduc to his counsellors, in answer to their advice upon his intention to give his realm in his life-time to his sons.

"I see no cause to draw my mind
To fear the nature of my loving sons,
Or to misdeem that envy or disdain
Can there work hate, where nature planteth love. —
In quiet I will pass mine aged days,
Free from the travail and the painful cares
That hasten age upon the worthiest kings.
But lest the fraud, that ye do seem to fear,
Of flattering tongues corrupt their tender youth,
And writhe them to the ways of youthful lust,
To climbing pride, or to revenging hate,
Or to neglecting of their careful charge,
Lewdly to live in wanton recklessness,
Or to oppressing of the rightful cause,
Or not to wreak the wrongs done to the poor,
To tread down truth, or favour false deceit;
I mean to join to either of my sons
Some one of those, whose long approved faith
And wisdom tried may well assure my heart,
That mining fraud shall find no way to creep
Into their fensed ears with grave advise."

Of higher mood are the strains which this noble author has penned in his Induction to the Mirror for Magistrates; the plan of which, resembling in some degree the Inferno of Dante, he is said to have formed in the same reign. Language can hardly paint expiring Famine, and Death triumphing, in stronger colours.

"But, O the doleful sight that then we see:
A griesly shape of Famine: ——
Her starved corpse, that rather seem'd a shade,
Than any substance of a creature made.
"On her while we thus firmly fix'd our eyes,
That bled for ruth of such a dreary sight,

(v) [Strype, Life of Sir Thomas Smith, p. 27.] (w) [Ibid. p. 218.] (x) [Ibid. Orat. IV. Append. p. 83.]

Lo suddenly she shriek'd in so huge wise,
As made hell-gates to shiver with the might,
Wherewith a dart we saw how it did light
Right on her breast, and therewithal pale Death
Enthrilling it to reave her of her breath.
" And by and by a dumb dead corpse we saw,
Heavy and cold, the shape of Death aright,
That daunts all earthly creatures to his law,
Against whose force in vain it is to fight.
Ne peers, ne princes, nor no mortal wight,
Ne towns, ne realms, cities, ne strongest tower,
But all perforce must yield unto his power.
" His dart anon out of the corpse he took,
And in his hand (a dreadful sight to see)
With great triumph eftsoones the same he shook,
That most of all my fears affrayed me:
His bodie dight with nought but bones perdie,
The naked shape of man there saw I plain,
All save the flesh, the sinew, and the veyn."

The delightfully figurative and picturesque style of our poetry is now to be observed in Spenser; who, as Warton has well remarked, here "stands without a rival." Even in our prose this high descriptive manner was sometimes adopted; and the romance of Sir Philip Sidney, at once a learned, manly, and fanciful composition, illustrates the richness of our tongue as well as the taste of the age, in the time of Elizabeth.

Advancing far into her reign, we find the language perfected in the Ecclesiastical Polity of Hooker. For if this noble composition be compared with the best writings of modern date, it will be found, as Lowth has pronounced, that in correctness, propriety, and purity of English style, he has hardly been surpassed, or even equalled, by any of his successors.

Among the authors of this period also, and who is to be studied as an original master of our tongue, the incomparable Shakspeare appears.

About this time, Joseph Hall, afterwards Bishop of Exeter and Norwich, distinguished himself as a writer of satires; of which kind of writing, so called, in our language, he has pronounced himself the first author.

" I first adventure, with fool-hardy might,
To tread the steps of perilous despite:
I first adventure, follow me who list,
And be the second English satirist."

He is better known as a theological writer, in the times of James the first and his successor. But as the composition illustrates existing manners and customs, I have brought forward the author at the precise date of it. Nor will I omit to notice some of his later works. These Satires were published in 1597. They often present models of elegance as well as wit, and admirable specimens of indignation as well as ridicule.

B. I. Sat. I.

" Nor ladie's wanton love, nor wandring knight,
Legend I out in rhimes all richly dight!
Nor fright the reader with the pagan vaunt
Of mightie Mahound, and great Termagaunt!
Nor list I sonnet of my mistress' face,
To paint some blowesse with a borrowed grace!
Nor can I bide to pen some hungrie scene
For thick-skin ears, and undiscerning eyne!"

B. I. Sat. VI.

" Another scorns the home-spun thread of rhymes,
Match'd with the lofty feet of elder times:
Give him the numbred verse that Virgil sung,
And Virgil's self shall speak the English tongue;
Manhood and garboiles shall he chaunt with chaunged feet,
And headstrong dactyls making musick meet!
The nimble (y) dactyls, striving to outgo
The drawling spondees, pacing it below!
The lingring spondees, labouring to delay
The breathless dactyls with a sudden stay!
Whoever saw a colt, wanton and wild,
Yok'd with a slow-foot ox on fallow field,
Can right areed how handsomely besets
Dull spondees with the English dactylets.
If Jove speak English in a thundring cloud,
Thwick-thwack, and riff-raff, roars he out aloud!
Fie on the forged mint that did create
New coin of words never articulate!"

B. III. Sat. I.

" Thou canst maske in garish gauderie,
To suit a fool's far-fetched liverie.
A French head joyn'd to necke Italian,
Thy thighs from Germanie, and breast from Spain:
An Englishman in none, a fool in all;
Many in one, and one in severall!"

B. V. Sat. II.

" House-keeping's dead! ———
Along thy way thou canst not but descry
Fair glittering halls to tempt the hopeful eye. —
So this gay gate adds fuel to thy thought,
That such proud piles were never rais'd for nought.
Beat the broad gates! a goodly hollow sound
With double echoes doth again rebound;
But not a dog doth bark to welcome thee,
Nor churlish porter canst thou chafing see:
All dumb and silent, like the dead of night,
Or dwelling of some sleepy Sybarite.
The marble pavement hid with desart weed,
With house-leek, thistle, dock, and hemlock seed! —
Look to the towred chimnies, which should be
The wind-pipes of good hospitality,
Through which it breatheth to the open air,
Betokening life and liberal well-fare;
Lo, there the unthankful swallow takes her rest,
And fills the tunnell with her circled nest!"

I know not whether it has been remarked, that, in the Characters of Virtues and Vices, published by this author in 1608, his propensity to satire, without the aid of poetry, is also very obvious. But bishop Hall has acquired, from his sententious way of writing, the name of the Christian Seneca; and his Meditations, which have been often printed, have been resembled to the Morals of the Philosopher. His style indeed is always pithy, sometimes highly animated, often delicate and tender. From his Treatise of Contentation I select the description of those, (z) who know how to want.

" Those only know how to want, that have learnt to frame their mind to their estate; like to a skilful musician, that can let down his strings a peg lower when the tune requires it; or like to some cunning spagyrick, that can intend or remit the heat of his furnace according to occasion. Those, who, when they must be abased, can stoop submissly; like to a gentle reed, which, when the wind blows stiff, yields every way. Those, that in an humble obeysance can lay themselves low at the foot of the Almighty, and put their mouth in the dust; that can patiently put their necks under the yoke of the Highest, and can say with the prophet, Truly this is my sorrow, and I must bear it. Those, that can smile upon their afflictions, rejoicing in their tribulation, singing in the jail with Paul and Silas at midnight. Lastly, those, that can improve misery to an advantage; being the richer for their want, bettered with evils, strengthened with infirmities; and can truly say to the Almighty, I know that of very faithfulness thou hast afflicted me."

As a fine writer, and one of the greatest of our literary benefactors, the brave and accomplished Ralegh is now to be noticed. His History of the World is a proud and undecaying monument of the power both of his talents and our tongue. To the dignity of history his style is particularly suited; pure, and never wanting nerve to strengthen it. There are also some (a) poetical remains, which elegantly exemplify his varied abilities.

Of Bacon the style is admirably diversified in the subjects of which he treats. The scholar accordingly marks the boldness of his imagery supported by suitable grandeur of diction. To the philosopher his discoveries are detailed with precision and perspicuousness. And to those of common attainments his easy and sententious language never speaks in vain. Of his Essays he has told us, that they, " (b) of all his other works, have been most current; for that, as it seems, they come home to men's business and bosoms."

For abundant illustrations of popular diction, as well as graces of fine writing, the curious investigator of our language may next resort to Jonson, the most learned and judicious comedian, as (c) Milton and his nephew Phillips call him. If in his language there was any fault, Dryden says, " (d) it was that he weaved it too closely and laboriously, in his comedies especially: perhaps, too, he did a little too much romanize our tongue, leaving the words which he translated almost as much Latin as he found them; wherein, though he learnedly followed their language, he did not enough comply with the idiom of ours."

In ascertaining the copiousness of our tongue, further assistance may be derived from the Anatomy of Melancholy, by Burton; a book described by Antony Wood as " (e) so full of variety of reading, that gentlemen who have lost their time, and are put to a push for invention, may furnish themselves with matter for common or scholastical discourse and writing." Burton was also distinguished as a " (f) thorough-paced philologist." Quaint as his style is, the work abounds with wit and learning; often with expressions of happy choice; and rarely without such digression from grave to gay, as to relieve the tediousness of perpetual citation. As a poet he might have excelled, if we may judge from the verses prefixed to his book; in which how pleasing the imagery and versification are, a stanza or two will show.

" When I go musing all alone,
Thinking of divers things fore-known;
When I build castles in the air,
Void of sorrow, and void of fear,
Pleasing myself with phantasms sweet;
Methinks the time runs very fleet.
All my joys to this are folly,
Nought so sweet as melancholy. —

" When to myself I act, and smile,
With pleasing thoughts the time beguile,
By a brook-side, or wood so green,
Unheard, unsought-for, and unseen;
A thousand pleasures do me bless,
And crown my soul with happiness.
All my joys besides are folly,
Nought so sweet as melancholy."

In commendation of this mental luxury we also find the poets Beaumont and Fletcher, contemporary with Burton, employed. The Song in their drama, entitled Nice Valour, displaying the moral, the figure, and the disposition of melancholy, has been repeatedly observed to have suggested sentiments in the Il Penseroso of Milton. To these poets our language is, according to Dryden, in the greatest degree indebted. "(g) Their plots were generally more regular than Shakspeare's, especially those that were made before Beaumont's death; and they understood and imitated the conversation of gentlemen much better. — Humour, which Ben Jonson derived from particular persons, they made it not their business to describe: they represented all the passions very lively, but above all, love. I am apt to believe the English language in them arrived to its highest perfection; what words have since been taken in, are rather superfluous than ornamental."

About this period wrote Owen Feltham, or Fellthan; of whose principal work, entitled Resolves, a second edition was published in 1628. These Resolves are short Essays upon various subjects, displaying fine sentiments and harmonious language; and sometimes highly poetical conception. He has indeed written some poetry; but it is by his prose that he is distinguished. "(h) Love those pleasures well," he says, "that are on all sides legitimated by the bounty of heaven; after which no private gripe, nor fancyed goblin, comes to upbraid my sense for using them; but such as may with equal pleasure be again dreamed over, and not disturb my sleep. This is to take off the parchings of the summer sun, by bathing in a pure and chrystal fountain." Again: "(i) Wisdom and knowledge are sweet as the wakened musings of delightful thoughts, which not only dew the mind with perfumes that ever refresh us, but raise us to the mountain that gives us view of Canaan; and shews us rays and glimpses of the glory that shall after crown us. Yet it is the object only that makes these good unto man, when God is the ocean that all his streams make way unto." Yet once more will I cite this attractive writer; and the very beginning of the citation will call to the scholar's mind the words of Milton in his Lycidas:

> "Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise,
> The last infirmity of noble mind:"

And he may find that, elsewhere also, Feltham says, "(k) In noble minds praise is certainly a spur, if not reward, to virtue."

"(l) Desire of glory is the last garment that even wise men lay aside. For this you may take Tacitus: 'Etiam sapientibus cupido gloriæ novissima exuitur.' Not that it betters himself, being gone; but that it stirs up those that follow him to an earnest endeavour after noble actions; which is the only means to win the fame we wish for. Themistocles that streamed out his youth in wine and venery, and was suddenly changed to a virtuous and valiant man, told one that asked what did so strangely change him, that the trophy of Miltiades would not let him sleep. Tamerlane made it his practice to read often the heroick deeds of his progenitors; not as boasting in them, but as glorious examples propounded to enfire his virtues. Surely nothing awakes our sleeping virtues, like the noble acts of our predecessors. They are flaming beacons, that fame and time have set on hills, to call us to a defence of virtue, whensoever vice invades the commonwealth of man. Who can endure to sculk away his life in an idle corner, when he has means? and finds how fame has blown about deserving names? Worth begets, in weak and base minds, envy; but, in those that are magnanimous, emulation. Roman virtue made Roman virtues lasting. Brave men never die, but like the phœnix; from whose preserved ashes one or other still springs up, like them."—

We now approach the time, when "our language began to lose the stability which it had obtained in that of Elizabeth; and was considered by every writer as a subject on which he might try his plastick skill, by moulding it according to his own fancy." Such is the remark of (m) Dr. Johnson, arising from a consideration of the style of Sir Thomas Brown; a style "vigorous, but rugged; learned, but pedantick; deep, but obscure: it strikes, but does not please; it commands, but does not allure: his tropes are harsh, and his combinations uncouth." This is attributed to the disposition of the age already noticed. "Milton," it is added, "in consequence of this encroaching licence, began to introduce the Latin idiom; and Brown, though he gave less disturbance to our structure and phraseology, yet poured in a multitude of exotick words; many, indeed, useful and significant, which, if rejected, must be supplied by circumlocution; and some so obscure, that they conceal his meaning rather than explain it." Of Brown Dr. Johnson was an admirer, and in some respects an imitator. In our immortal Milton (to whose prose alone the preceding observation applies) he has injuriously omitted to notice, that, though the structure of his sentences may sometimes be affected, the most glowing diction abounds, and perspicuity, comprehensivenes, dignity, and closeness are often found united. If there were not innumerable passages, which might be cited from his prose-works, to illustrate those powers of his expression as well as the elevation of his thought, the Areopagitica and the Treatise on Education are distinct proofs of this assertion.

The influx of Latin words is also to be traced to an earlier period. It must have made some progress in the time of Sir Philip Sidney, who, in a kind of masque presented before queen Elizabeth, introduces master Rombus, a pedagogue, eloquent in Anglo-Latinisms, which it is evidently the object of Sidney to ridicule. But the pedantick style was triumphant in the reign of James. The pious and learned bishop Andrews, pedantick in his conceits as well as diction, was styled the star of preachers. The great Bacon could sometimes sacrifice his judgement to the absurd fondness for the Latin and English intermixture. And Dryden has considered Jonson not only as occasionally "romanizing our tongue too much," but also in the practice as "not enough complying with our own idiom." The love of latinizing is to be found in many writers of little note till late in the seventeenth century. But I know none, in whom it is so glaring, and often so offensive, as in Waterhouse, the learned commentator on Fortescue. Heylin, in 1658, made this remark: "(n) Many think, that they can never speak elegantly, nor write significantly, except they do it in a language of their own devising; as if they were ashamed of their mother-tongue, and thought it not sufficiently curious to express their fancies. By means whereof more French and Latin words have gained ground upon us since the middle of queen Elizabeth's reign, than were admitted by our ancestors (whether we look upon them as the British or Saxon race) not only since the Norman but the Roman conquest." Of Heylin himself, a voluminous, acute, and learned writer, it has been said (o) that he so spoke as to be understood by the meanest hearer, and so wrote as to be comprehended by the most vulgar reader.

In referring to the reigns of our first and second Charles, we meet, however, with abundance of fine writing; with the clear and lively style which Chillingworth displays in exposing the tricks of sophistry; with the unadorned but manly periods of Hammond, "(p) spreading the treasur'd stores of truth divine;" with language strong and pure in the dangerous compositions of Hobbes; and with phraseology, though not laboured, correctly dignified, in the sentences of Clarendon, which always gratify by the precision with which they describe events, and more particularly characters. But in bishop Jeremy Taylor the diction of our country "(q) bursts out into sudden blaze." It is grand, it is awful, it is pathetick; bright and energetick, it irresistibly seizes the attention; copiously diversified, it has charms for the unlettered as well as for the scholar and the man of taste. His painting of the various ways, in which the last enemy that shall be destroyed, accosts us, is perhaps unrivalled.

"(r) Death meets us every where, and is procured by every instrument, and in all chances; and enters in at many doors: by violence, and secret influence; by the aspect of a star, and the stink of a mist; by the emissions of a cloud, and the meeting of a vapour; by the fall of a chariot, and the stumbling at a stone; by a full meal, or an empty stomach; by watching at the wine, or by watching at prayers; by the sun or the moon; by a heat or a cold; by sleepless nights, or sleeping days; by water frozen into the hardness and sharpness of a dagger, or water thawed into the floods of a river; by a hair or a raisin; by violent motion, or sitting still; by severity, or dissolution; by God's mercy, or God's anger; by every thing in providence, and every thing in manners; by every thing in nature, and every thing in chance. Eripitur persona, manet res; we take pains to heap up things useful to our life, and get our death in the purchase; and the person is snatched away, and the goods remain: and all this is the law and constitution of nature; it is a punishment to our sins, the unalterable event of providence, and the decree of heaven. The chains that confine us to this condition are strong as destiny, and immutable as the eternal laws of God.

" I have conversed with some men who rejoiced in the death or calamity upon others, and accounted it as a judgement upon them for being on the other side, and against them in the contention; but within the revolution of a few months the same man met with a more uneasy and unhandsome death; which when I saw, I wept, and was afraid; for I knew that it must be so with all men: for we also shall die, and end our quarrels and contentions, by passing to a final sentence."

With what elegant vivacity of diction has he illustrated a more attractive subject, if I may make one more citation from his admirable works! "(s) Marriage is the mother of the world, and preserves kingdoms, and fills cities and churches, and heaven itself. Celibacy, like the fly in the heart of an apple, dwells in perpetual sweetness, but sits alone, and is confined and dies in singularity; but marriage, like the useful bee, builds a house and gathers sweetness from every flower, and labours and unites into societies and republicks, and sends out colonies, and feeds the world with delicacies, and obeys their king, and keeps order, and exercises many virtues, and promotes the interest of mankind, and is that state of good things to which God hath designed the present constitution of the world."

About the same time flourished Dr. Henry More, the celebrated Platonist, esteemed one of our greatest divines and philosophers, and no mean poet. Though now perhaps little remembered, it may be proper to exemplify his style. Nor will it be found that he, who in the seventeenth century was so enthusiastically admired, wanted power of fancy or considerable vigour of expression.

"(t) Then wilt thou say, God rules the world,
Though mountain, over mountain hurl'd,
Be pitch'd amid the foaming main: —
Though inward tempests fiercely rock
The tottering earth, that with the shock
High spires and heavy rocks fall down: —
Though pitchy blasts from hell up-borne
Stop the outgoings of the morn;
And nature play her fiery games,
In this forc'd night with fulgurant flames,
Baring by fits, for more affright,
The pale dead visages (ghastly sight)
Of men astonish'd at the stour
Of heaven's great rage, the rattling shower
Of hail, the hoarse bellowing of thunder,
Their own loud shrieks made mad with wonder:
All this confusion cannot move
The purged mind, freed from the love
Of commerce with her body dear,
Cell of sad thoughts, sole spring of fear!"

"(u) Whether therefore our eyes be struck with that more radiant lustre of the sun, or whether we behold that more placid and calm beauty of the moon; or be refreshed with the sweet breathings of the open air; or be taken up with the contemplation of those pure sparkling lights of the stars; or stand astonished at the gushing downfalls of some mighty river, as that of Nile; or admire the height of some insuperable and inaccessible rock or mountain; or with a pleasant horrour and chilness look upon some silent wood, or solemn shady grove; whether the face of heaven smile upon us with a chearful bright azure, or look upon us with a more sad and minacious countenance, dark pitchy clouds being charged with thunder and lightning to let fly against the earth; whether the air be cool, fresh, and healthful, or whether it be sultry, contagious, and pestilential, so that while we gasp for life we are forced to draw in a sudden and inevitable death; whether the earth stand firm and prove favourable to the industry of the artificer, or whether she threaten the very foundations of our buildings with trembling and tottering earthquakes accompanied with remugient echoes and ghastly murmurs from below; whatever notable emergencies happen for either good or bad to us; these are the Joves and Vejoves that we worship, which to us are not many but one God, who has the only power to save or destroy. And therefore from whatever part of this magnificent temple of his, the world, he shall send forth his voice, our hearts and eyes are presently directed thitherward with fear, love, and veneration.

"Nor does our devotion stop here, or rather stay only without; but those more notable alterations, and commotions, we find within ourselves, we attribute also to him whose spirit, life, and power filleth all things. And therefore those very passions of love and wrath, on the former whereof dependeth all that kindly sweetness of affection that is found in either the friendship of men or love of women, as on the latter all the pomp and splendour of war; these, with the rest of the passions of the soul, we look upon as manifestations of his presence, who worketh every where for our solace, punishment, or trial."

Hence we proceed to the learned and copious, I might say occasionally redundant, Barrow; in whom accuracy of erudition, energy of style, and force of reasoning, are alike conspicuous. His description of wit is a masterpiece of composition.

"(v) First, it may be demanded, what the thing we speak of is? Or what this facetiousness doth import? To which questions I might reply, as Democritus did to him that asked the definition of a man, 'Tis that which we all see and know.' Any one better apprehends what it is by acquaintance, than I can inform him by description. It is, indeed, a thing so versatile and multiform, appearing in so many shapes, so many postures, so many garbs, so variously apprehended by several eyes and judgements, that it seemeth no less hard to settle a clear and certain notion thereof, than to make a portrait of Proteus, or to define the figure of the fleeting air. Sometimes it lieth in pat allusion to a known story, or in seasonable application of a trivial saying, or in forging an apposite tale: sometimes it playeth in words and phrases, taking advantage from the ambiguity of their sense, or the affinity of their sound: sometimes it is wrapped in a dress of humorous expression: sometimes it lurketh under an odd similitude: sometimes it is lodged in a sly question, in a smart answer, in a quirkish reason, in a shrewd intimation, in cunningly divesting or cleverly retorting an objection: sometimes it is couched in a bold scheme of speech, in a tart irony, in a lusty hyperbole, in a startling metaphor, in a plausible reconciling of contradictions, or in acute nonsense: sometimes a scenical representation of persons or things, a counterfeit speech, a mimical look or gesture, passeth for it: sometimes an affected simplicity, sometimes a presumptuous bluntness giveth it being: sometimes it riseth only from a lucky hitting upon what is strange: sometimes from a crafty wresting obvious matter to the purpose. Often it consisteth in one knows not what, and springeth up one can hardly tell how. Its ways are unaccountable, and inexplicable: being answerable to the numberless rovings of fancy, and windings of language. It is, in short, a manner of speaking out of the simple and plain way, (such as reason teacheth and proveth things by,) which, by a pretty surprizing uncouthness in conceit or expression, doth affect and amuse the fancy, stirring in it some wonder, and breeding some delight thereto. It raiseth admiration, as signifying a nimble sagacity of apprehension, a special felicity of invention, a vivacity of spirit, and reach of wit more than vulgar; it seeming to argue a rare quickness of parts, that one can fetch in remote conceits applicable; a notable skill, that he can dextrously accommodate them to the purpose before him; together with a lively briskness of humour, not apt to damp those sportful flashes of imagination. Whence in Aristotle such persons are termed επιδεξιοι, dextrous men, and ευτροφοι, men of facile or versatile manners, who can easily turn themselves to all things, or turn all things to themselves.) It also procureth delight, by gratifying curiosity with its rareness, as semblance of difficulty: (as monsters, not for their beauty, but their rarity; as juggling tricks, not for their use, but their abstruseness, are beheld with pleasure:) by diverting the mind from its road of serious thoughts; by instilling gaiety and airiness of spirit; by provoking to such dispositions of spirit; in way of emulation or complaisance, and by seasoning matters, otherwise distasteful or insipid, with an unusual and thence grateful tang."

Coeval with Barrow was bishop Pearson; of whose writings the very dust has been pronounced by Bentley gold. That for exactness of method, correctness of language, and well-turned periods, he is to be ranked among our best writers, all will acknowledge who have read with attention his Exposition of the Creed. I will select his analogical illustration of the resurrection.

"(w) Beside the principles of which we consist, and the actions which flow from us, the consideration of the things without us, and the natural course of variations in the creature, will render the resurrection yet more highly probable. Every space of twenty-four hours teacheth thus much, in which there is always a revolution amounting to a resurrection. The day dies into a night, and is buried in silence and in darkness; in the next morning it appeareth again and reviveth, opening the grave of darkness, rising from the dead of night; this is a diurnal resurrection. As the day dies into night, so doth the summer into winter: the sap is said to descend into the root, and there it lies buried in the ground; the earth is covered with snow, or crusted with frost, and becomes a general sepulchre; when the spring appeareth all begin to rise, the plants and flowers peep out of their graves, revive, and grow and flourish; this is the annual resurrection. The corn by which we live, and for want of which we perish with famine, is notwithstanding cast upon the earth, and buried in the ground, with a design that it may corrupt, and being corrupted may revive and multiply; our bodies are fed by this constant experiment, and we continue this present life by succession of resurrections. Thus all things are repaired by corrupting, are preserved by perishing, and revive by dying; and can we think that man, the lord of all these things, which thus die and revive for him, should be detained in death as never to live again? Is it imaginable that God should thus restore all things to man, and not to restore man to himself? If there were no other consideration, but of the principles of human nature, of the liberty and remunerability of human actions, and of the natural revolutions and resurrections of other creatures, it were abundantly sufficient to render the resurrection of our bodies highly probable.

"We must not rest in this school of nature, nor settle our persuasions upon likelihoods; but as we passed from an apparent possibility, unto a high presumption and probability, so must we pass from thence unto a full assurance of an infallible certainty. And of this indeed we cannot be assured but by the revelation of the will of God; upon his power we must conclude that we may, from his will that we shall, rise from the dead. Now the power of God is known unto all men, and therefore all men may infer from thence a possibility; but the will of God is not revealed unto all men, and therefore all have not an infallible certainty of the resurrection. For the grounding of which assurance, I shall shew that God hath revealed the determination of his will to raise the dead, and that he hath not only delivered that intention in his Word, but hath also several ways confirmed the same."

Of the same period was Cowley, the ease and unaffected structure of whose sentences Dr. Johnson has especially commended. Hence a learned biographer of the critick has taken occasion to consider his injudicious partiality to Brown; and in the following discriminative remarks to introduce some of our finest writers, with a comparative estimate also of Addison and Johnson. "(x) Cowley," he observes, "may be placed at the head of those who cultivated a clear and natural style. Dryden, Tillotson, and Sir William Temple, followed. Addison, Swift, and Pope, with more correctness, carried our language well nigh to perfection. Of Addison Johnson was used to say, He is the Raphael of Essay writers. How he differed so widely from such elegant models, is a problem not to be solved, unless it be true, that he took an early tincture from the writers of the last century, [the seventeenth,] particularly Sir Thomas Brown. Hence the peculiarities of his style, new combinations, sentences of an unusual structure, and words derived from the learned languages. His own account of the matter is, When common words were less pleasing to the ear, or less distinct in their signification, I familiarized the terms of philosophy, by applying them to popular ideas. But he forgot the observation of Dryden, If too many foreign words are poured in upon us, it looks as if they were designed, not to assist the natives, but to conquer them. There is, it must be admitted, a swell of language, often out of all proportion to the sentiment; but there is, in general, a fulness of mind, and the thought seems to expand with the sound of the words. Determined to discard colloquial barbarisms and licentious idioms, he forgot

(w) [Expos. of the Creed, Art. XI. The Resurrection of the Body.]
(x) [Arthur Murphy, Life of Dr. Johnson.]

the elegant simplicity that distinguishes the writings of Addison. He had what Locke calls a round-about view of his subject; and though he was never tainted, like many modern wits, with the ambition of shining in paradox, he may be fairly called an original thinker. His reading was extensive. He treasured in his mind whatever was worthy of notice, but he added to it from his own meditation. He collected quæ reconderet, auctaque promeret.

" Addison was not so profound a thinker. He was born to write, converse, and live with ease: and he found an early patron in lord Somers. He depended, however, more upon a fine taste than the vigour of his mind. His Latin poetry shows that he relished, with a just selection, all the refined and delicate beauties of the Roman classicks; and, when he cultivated his native language, no wonder that he formed that graceful style which has been so justly admired; simple, yet elegant; adorned, yet never over-wrought; rich in allusion, yet pure and perspicuous; correct, without labour; and though sometimes deficient in strength, yet always musical. His essays in general are on the surface of life; if ever original, it was in pieces of humour. Sir Roger de Coverley, and the tory fox-hunter, need not to be mentioned.

" Johnson had a fund of humour, but he did not know it; nor was he willing to descend to the familiar idiom, and the variety of diction, which that mode of composition required. The letter in the Rambler, No. 12., from a young girl that wants a place, will illustrate this observation.

" Addison possessed an unclouded imagination, alive to the first objects of nature and of art. He reaches the sublime without any apparent effort. When he tells us, ' If we consider the fixed stars as so many oceans of flame, that are each of them attended with a different set of planets; if we still discover new firmaments, and new lights, that are sunk farther in those unfathomable depths of æther; we are lost in a labyrinth of suns and worlds, and confounded with the magnificence and immensity of nature.' The ease, with which this passage rises to unaffected grandeur, is the secret charm that captivates the reader.

" Johnson is always lofty; he seems, to use Dryden's phrase, to be o'er-inform'd with meaning, and his words do not appear to himself adequate to his conception. He moves in state, and his periods are always harmonious. His oriental tales are in the true style of eastern magnificence, and yet none of them are so much admired as the visions of Mirza. In matters of criticism, Johnson is never the echo of preceding writers: he thinks and decides for himself.

" If we except the Essays on the Pleasures of Imagination, Addison cannot be called a philosophical critick. His Moral Essays are beautiful; but in that province nothing can exceed the Rambler; though Johnson used to say, that the Essay on the Burthens of Mankind (in the Spectator, No. 558.) was the most exquisite he had ever read.

" Talking of himself, Johnson said, ' Topham Beauclerk has wit, and every thing comes from him with ease; but when I say a good thing, I seem to labour.' When we compare him with Addison, the contrast is still stronger. Addison lends grace and ornament to truth; Johnson gives it force and energy. Addison makes virtue amiable; Johnson represents it as an awful duty. Addison insinuates himself with an air of modesty; Johnson commands like a dictator, but a dictator in his splendid robes, not labouring at the plough. Addison is the Jupiter of Virgil, with placid serenity talking to Venus, ' vultu, quo cœlum tempestatesque serenat.' Johnson is Jupiter tonans: he darts his lightning, and rolls his thunder, in the cause of virtue and piety. The language seems to fall short of his ideas; he pours along, familiarizing the terms of philosophy, with bold inversions, and sonorous periods; but we may apply to him what Pope has said of Homer: ' It is the sentiment that swells and fills out the diction, which rises with it, and forms itself about it; like glass in the furnace, which grows to a greater magnitude, as the breath within is more powerful, and the heat more intense.'

" It is not the design of this comparison to decide between these two eminent writers. In matters of taste every reader will choose for himself. Johnson is always profound, and of course gives the fatigue of thinking. Addison charms while he instructs; and writing, as he always does, a pure, an elegant, an idiomatick style, he may be pronounced the safest model for imitation."

The great master of our language, however, in the estimation of Johnson himself, is evidently Dryden. " (y) Dryden," he says, " in his prose is always another and the same; he does not exhibit a second time the same elegances in the same form, nor appears to have any art other than that of expressing with clearness what he thinks with vigour. His style could not easily be imitated, either seriously or ludicrously; for, being always equable and always varied, it has no prominent or discriminative characters. The beauty, who is totally free from disproportion of parts and features, cannot be ridiculed by an overcharged resemblance. From his prose, however, Dryden derives only his accidental and secondary praise: the veneration, with which his name is pronounced by every cultivator of English literature, is paid to him as he refined the language, improved the sentiments, and tuned the numbers, of English poetry."

Allowing Dryden this supremacy, the cultivators of our literature, however, will acknowledge, with pride as well as gratitude, their obligations to those who flourished near his time: to Tillotson and Temple, each distinguished for simplicity of style; the former also for his perspicuity, the latter for ease and harmony: to Swift, who, regardless of harmonious periods, writes with plainness and with precision; who "(z) studied purity," and has rarely missed it; who of correct English is a model: to Addison, "the sweetest child of Attick elegance:" to Pope, of whom Watts has said, that there is scarcely a happy combination of words, or a phrase poetically elegant in the English language, which he has not inserted into his version of Homer: to South, whose rich diction is rarely unaccompanied with honest indignation, or keen sarcasm: to the polished and graceful Atterbury: to Scott, the eloquent author of the Christian Life: to Locke, who "(a) yields not the palm of metaphysical acuteness to the sullen sophistry of Hobbes, or the cold scepticism of Hume:" and to Berkeley, before whose "brilliancy of imagination, and delicacy of taste," the labour and pomp of Shaftesbury sink into insignificance.

We come now to the contemporaries of Johnson, and find in Warburton the force and freedom of the lexicographer, but not the splendid diction. The character of Warburton's style, "(b) is freedom and force united." Nobody understood the philosophy of grammar better; yet in the construction of his terms he was not nice, rather he was somewhat negligent. — To say all in a word, he possessed, in an eminent degree, those two qualities of a great writer, sapere et fari; I mean, superior sense, and the power of doing justice to it by a sound and manly eloquence. It was an ignorant cavil, that charged him with want of taste. The objection arose from the originality of his manners; but he wrote, when he thought fit, with the greatest purity and even elegance, notwithstanding his strength and energy, which frequently exclude those qualities." Of a different excellence of style and manner we have a most pleasing example in Goldsmith. All is inartificial. His periods, however, are "so smooth and full of melodious sounds," that to a true English ear "the harp of Orpheus cannot be more charming." To his contemporary, who assumed the name of Junius, Johnson himself has conceded (c) liveliness of imagery, pungency of periods, and fertility of allusion; but cannot think the style of this writer secure from criticism, or that his expressions are not often trite, and his periods feeble. At another time Johnson said, "(d) I should have believed Burke to be Junius, because I know no man but Burke who is capable of writing these letters; but Burke spontaneously denied it to me. The case would have been different, had I asked him if he was the author; a man so questioned, as to an anonymous publication, may think he has a right to deny it." To the eloquent, the malignant, and still unmasked calumniator, Burke is certainly not inferior in any charm of composition; and when Burke impugned the characters or opinions of others, he had recourse to "open war," and not to "covert guile." If we look for simple elegance of style, where is it more conspicuous than in his philosophical criticism on the Sublime and Beautiful? if for richer ornaments of diction, for rhetorick both splendid and affecting, where are they more thickly sown than in his tract upon the French Revolution? But by his morals as well as faculties Burke gratifies the reader; and is not found like the infidel philosopher to whom England is indebted for one of her histories, or like the learned investigator of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, sullying the finest graces of language with indecent sneers against revealed religion. Lastly, as to a model of the elegant diction of modern times, and which is not made the vehicle of licentious opinions, we may resort to Warton, the historian of English poetry. His style is remarkable for its perspicuity; and the modulation or dignity of his periods is exceeded only by those of him, " WHOSE WRITINGS HAVE GIVEN ARDOUR TO VIRTUE AND CONFIDENCE TO TRUTH."

Of the power over language, which the last great writer has exercised, his preface to this Dictionary is an ample and noble specimen. But to few readers are any of Dr. Johnson's compositions unknown. Mr. Warton's delightful work, on account of its learned allusions and antiquarian research, has not been so generally explored. An extract from it, therefore, may to some be a novel display of the richness of our tongue; and may be not the less gratifying, if it opens to their view some exploded ceremonies of " the olden time."

" (e) The age of queen Elizabeth is commonly called the golden age of English poetry. It certainly may not improperly be styled the most poetical age of these annals.

" Among the great features which strike us in the poetry of this period, are the predominancy of fable, of fiction, and fancy, and a predilection for interesting adventures and pathetic events. I will endeavour to assign and explain the cause of this characteristic distinction, which may chiefly be referred to the following principles, sometimes blended, and sometimes operating singly: The revival and vernacular versions of the classics, the importation and translation of Italian novels, the visionary reveries or refinements of false philosophy, a degree of superstition sufficient for the purposes of poetry, the adoption of the machineries of romance, and the frequency and improvements of allegoric exhibition in the popular spectacles.

" When the corruptions and impostures of popery were abolished, the fashion of cultivating the Greek and Roman learning became universal: and the literary character was no longer appropriated to scholars by profession, but assumed by the nobility and gentry. The ecclesiastics had found it their interest to keep the languages of antiquity to themselves, and men were eager to know what had been so long injuriously concealed. Truth propagates truth, and the mantle of mystery was removed not only from religion but from literature. The laity, who had now been taught to assert their natural privileges, became impatient of the old monopoly of knowledge, and demanded admittance to the usurpations of the clergy. The general curiosity for new discoveries, heightened either by just or imaginary ideas of the treasures contained in the Greek and Roman writers, excited all persons of leisure and fortune to study the classics. The pedantry of the present age was the politeness of the last. An accurate comprehension of the phraseology and peculiarities of the ancient poets, historians, and orators, which yet seldom went farther than a kind of technical erudition, was an indispensable and almost the principal object in the circle of a gentleman's education. Every young lady of fashion was carefully instituted in classical letters: and the daughter of a duchess was taught, not only to distil strong waters, but to construe Greek. Among the learned females of high distinction, queen Elizabeth herself was the most conspicuous. Roger Ascham, her preceptor, speaks with rapture of her astonishing progress in the Greek nouns; and declares, with no small degree of triumph, that during a long residence at Windsor-castle, she was accustomed to read more Greek in a day, than 'some prebendary of that church did Latin in one week.' And although perhaps a princess looking out words in a lexicon, and writing down hard phrases from Plutarch's Lives, may be thought at present a more incompatible and extraordinary character, than a canon of Windsor understanding no Greek and but little Latin, yet Elizabeth's passion for these acquisitions was then natural, and resulted from the genius and habitudes of her age.

" The books of antiquity being thus familiarized to the great, every thing was tinctured with ancient history and mythology. The heathen gods, although discountenanced by the Calvinists on a suspicion of their tending to cherish and revive a spirit of idolatry, came into general vogue. When the queen paraded through a country town, almost every pageant was a pantheon. When she paid a visit at the house of any of her nobility, at entering the hall she was saluted by the Penates, and conducted to her privy-chamber by Mercury. Even the pastry-cooks were expert mythologists. At dinner, select transformations of Ovid's Metamorphoses were exhibited in confectionary; and the splendid iceing of an immense historic plum-cake, was embossed with a delicious basso-relievo of the destruction of Troy. In the afternoon, when she condescended to walk in the garden, the lake was covered with Tritons and Nereids: the pages of the family were converted into Wood-nymphs, who peeped from every bower; and the footmen gamboled over the lawns in the figure of Satyrs." ——

I have thus made some slight additions to Dr. Johnson's history of our language; showing a variety of style which has obtained, and humbly guiding the curious to more ample information on the subject. An elaborate and regular history of the English tongue is a desideratum in our literature; and instead of a paucity of materials subservient to this object, as Dr. Johnson would insinuate, there is abundance. Volumes are due to it. Let the investigator mark the unwearied labours of Wanley in his description of Saxon manuscripts; let him explore others, which in the libraries of our cathedrals, and colleges, and other repositories, exist, and have not received the advantage of Wanley's notice: and he will not complain of the paucity of materials. Next, let him attend to the following remark of Mr. Tyrwhitt. "In order to trace with exactness the progress of any language, it seems necessary, 1. that we should have before us a continued series of authors; 2. that those authors should have been approved, as having written, at least, with purity; and 3. that their writings should have been correctly copied. In the English language, we have scarce any authors within the first century after the Conquest; of those, who wrote before Chaucer, and whose writings have been preserved, we have no testimony of approbation from their contemporaries or successors; and lastly, the copies of their works, which we have received, are in general so full of inaccuracies, as to make it often very difficult for us to be assured, that we are in possession of the genuine words of the author." Such materials let him examine with care; and he will find, what in the present sketch I have occasionally but briefly shown, that the collation of what is printed with what is written will often establish that which has been disputed, and rectify that which has been perverted. Let him moreover precisely ascertain and compare our provincial dialects. And thus his labours may tend to form a complete history of the language, and at the same time illustrate the general philosophy of speech.]

THE ENGLISH TONGUE,

BY DR. JOHNSON:

WITH NOTES BY THE REV. H. J. TODD.

GRAMMAR, which is the art of using words properly, comprises four parts; Orthography, Etymology, Syntax, and Prosody.

In this division and order of the parts of grammar I follow the common grammarians, without enquiring whether a fitter distribution might not be found. Experience has long shown this method to be so distinct as to obviate confusion, and so comprehensive as to prevent any inconvenient omissions. I likewise use the terms already received, and already understood, though perhaps others more proper might sometimes be invented. Sylburgius, and other innovators, whose new terms have sunk their learning into neglect, have left sufficient warning against the trifling ambition of teaching arts in a new language.

ORTHOGRAPHY is the art of combining letters into syllables, and syllables into words. It therefore teaches previously the form and sound of letters.

The letters of the English language are, more commonly izzard or uzzard, that is s hard.

To these may be added certain combinations of letters (a) universally used in printing; as ﬅ, ﬆ, ﬂ, ﬁ, ﬃ, ﬄ, and &, or and per se, and, ﬅ, ﬆ, ﬂ, ﬁ, ﬃ, ﬄ, ſt, ſt, ſt

The a slender is the proper English a, called very justly by Erpenius, in his Arabick Grammar, a Anglicum cum e mistum, as having a middle sound between the open a and the e. The French have a similar sound in the word pais, and in their e masculine.

A open is the a of the Italian, or nearly resembles it; as father, rather, congratulate, fancy, glass.

A broad resembles the a of the German; as all, wall, call.

Many words pronounced with a broad were anciently written with au, as fault, mault; and we still say fault, vault. This was probably the Saxon sound, for it is yet retained in the northern dialects, and in the rustick pronunciation; as maun for man, haund for hand.

The short a approaches to the a open, as grass.

The long a, if prolonged by e at the end of the word, is always slender, as graze, fame.

A forms a diphthong only with i or y, and u or w, ai or ay, as in plain, wain, gay, clay, has (d) only the sound of the long and slender a, and differs not in the pronunciation from plane, wane.

Au or aw has the sound of the German a, as rawh, naughty.

Ae is sometimes found in Latin words not compleatly naturalised or assimilated, but is no English diphthong; and is more properly expressed by single e, as Cesar, Eneas.

E.

E is the letter which occurs most frequently in the English language.

E is long, as in scēne; or short, as in cĕllar, sĕparate, cĕlebrate, mĕn, thĕn.

It is always short before a double consonant, or two consonants, as in vĕx, pĕrplexity, rĕlent, mĕdlar, rĕptile, sĕrpent, cĕllar, cĕssation, blĕssing, fĕll, fĕlling, dĕbt.

E is always mute at the end of a word, except in monosyllables that have no other vowel, as the; or proper names, as Penelope, Phebe, Derbe; being used to modify the foregoing consonant, as since, once, hedge, oblige; or to lengthen the preceding vowel, as băn, bāne; căn, cāne; pĭn, pīne; tŭn, tūne; rŏb, rōbe; pŏp, pōpe; fĭr, fīre; cŭr, cūre; tŭb, tūbe.

Almost all words which now terminate in consonants ended anciently in e, as year, yeare; wildness, wildnesse; which e probably had the force of the French e feminine, and constituted a syllable with its associate consonant; for, in old editions, words are sometimes divided thus, clea-re, fel-le, knowled-ge. This e was perhaps for a time vocal or silent in poetry as convenience required; but it has been long wholly mute. Camden in his Remains calls it the silent e.

It does not always lengthen the foregoing vowel, as glŏve, lĭve, gĭve.

It has sometimes in the end of words a sound obscure, and scarcely perceptible, as open, shapen, shotten, thistle, participle, lucre.

This faintness of sound is found when e separates a mute from a liquid, as in rotten; or follows a mute and liquid, as in cattle.

E forms a diphthong with a, as near; with i, as deign, receive; and with u or w, as new, flew.

Ea sounds like e long, as mean; or like ee, as dear, clear, near.

Ei is sounded like e long, as seize, perceiving.

Eu sounds as u long and soft.

E, a, u, are combined in beauty and its derivatives, but have only the sound of u.

E may be said to form a diphthong by reduplication, as agree, sleeping.

Eo is found in yeomen, where it is sounded as e short; and in people, where it is pronounced like ee.

I.

I has a sound, long, as fīne; and short, as fĭn.

That is eminently observable in i, which may be likewise remarked in other letters, that the short sound is not the long sound contracted, but a sound wholly different.

The long sound in monosyllables is always marked by the e final, as thĭn, thīne.

I is often sounded before r as a short u; as flirt, first, shirt.

It forms a diphthong only with e, as field, shield, which is sounded as the double ee; except friend, which is sounded as frĕnd.

I is joined with eu in lieu, and ew in view; which triphthongs are sounded as the open u.

O.

O is long, as bōne, ōbedient, corrōding; or short, as blŏck, knŏck, ŏblique, lŏll.

Women is pronounced wimen.

The short o has sometimes the sound of a close u, as son, come.

O coalesces into a diphthong with a, as moan, groan, approach; oa has the sound of o long.

O is united to e in some words derived from Greek, as œconomy; but oe being not an English diphthong, they are better written as they are sounded, with only e, economy.

With i, as oil, soil, moil, noisome.

This coalition of letters seems to unite the sounds of the two letters as far as two sounds can be united without being destroyed, and therefore approaches more nearly than any combination in our tongue to the notion of a diphthong.

With o, as boot, hoot, cooler; oo has the sound of the Italian u.

With u or w, as our, power, flower; but in some words has only the sound of o long, as in soul, bowl, sow, grow. These different sounds are used to distinguish different significations; as bow, an instrument for shooting; bow, a depression of the head; sow, the she of a boar; sow, to scatter seed; bowl, an orbicular body; bowl, a wooden vessel.

Ou is sometimes pronounced like o soft, as court; sometimes like o short, as cough; sometimes like u close, as could; or u open, as rough, tough; which use only can teach.

Ou is frequently used in the last syllable of words which in Latin end in or, and are made English, as honour, labour, favour, from honor, labor, favor.

Some late innovators have ejected the u, without considering that the last syllable gives the sound neither of or nor ur, but a sound between them, if not compounded of both; besides that they are probably derived to us from the French nouns in eur, as honeur, faveur.

U.

U is long in ūse, confūsion; or short, as ŭs, concŭssion.

It coalesces with a, e, i, o; but has rather in these combinations the force of the w, as quaff, quest, quit,

(d) [In some provinces the ai is yet pronounced by rusticks with the open sound of the monosyllable aye; as in pain, remain, tail, fail, &c. and probably was once more generally prevalent.]

quite, languish; sometimes in ui the i loses its sound, as in juice. It is sometimes mute before a, e, i, y, as guard, guest, guise, buy.

U is followed by e in virtue, but the e has no sound.

Ue is sometimes mute at the end of a word, in imitation of the French, as prorogue, synagogue, plague, vague, harangue.

Y.

Y is a (e) vowel, which, as Quintilian observes of one of the Roman letters, we might want without inconvenience, but that we have it. It supplies the place of i at the end of words, as thy; before an i, as dying; and is commonly retained in derivative words where it was part of a diphthong in the primitive; as destroy, destroyer; betray, betrayed, betrayer; pray, prayer; say, sayer; day, days.

Y being the Saxon vowel ȳ, which was commonly used where i is now put, occurs very frequently in all old books.

General Rules.

A vowel in the beginning or middle syllable, before two consonants, is commonly short, as ŏppŏrtunity.

In monosyllables a single vowel before a single consonant is short, as stag, frog.

Many is pronounced as if it were written menny.

OF CONSONANTS.

B.

B has one unvaried sound, such as it obtains in other languages.

It is mute in debt, debtor, subtle, doubt, lamb, limb, dumb, thumb, climb, comb, womb.

It is used before l and r, as black, brown.

C.

C has before e and i the sound of s; as sincerely, centrick, century, circular, cistern, city, siccity: before a, o, and u, it sounds like k, as calm, concavity, copper, incorporate, curiosity, concupiscence.

C might be omitted in the language without loss, since one of its sounds might be supplied by s, and the other by k, but that it preserves to the eye the etymology of words, as face from facies, captive from captivus.

Ch has a sound which is analysed into tsh, as church, chin, crutch. It is the same sound which the Italians give to the c simple before i and e, as citta, cerro.

Ch is sounded like k in words derived from the Greek, as chymist, scheme, choler. Arch is commonly sounded ark before a vowel, as archangel; and with the English sound of ch before a consonant, as archbishop.

Ch, in some French words not yet assimilated, sounds like sh. as machine, chaise.

C, having no determinate sound, according to English orthography (f) never ends a word; therefore we write stick, block, which were originally sticke, blocke, in such words. C is now mute.

It is used before l and r, as clock, cross.

(e) [See the observation on this letter in the Dictionary, that it is taken erroneously for a consonant; which Ben Jonson also thought. Eng. Gramm. ch. 3.: and the note on y as a consonant in this Grammar.

(f) [Formerly c was not used as a final letter, probably because it was thought doubtful in what manner it should be pronounced in such a situation: this at least is the reason assigned by Dr. Johnson, who retains the final ck in every instance. But I suspect that this orthography was originally established on account of the final e, which anciently followed these letters; as in sticke, blocke, musicke. As long as that vowel retained any sound, its regular effect, without the intervention of k, would have been to soften the c; and even if the c had been doubled, to mark the shortness of the preceding vowel, the letter c would have been softened by e: the only alternative was to write kk, or ck, and the latter was preferred, being moreover a compromise, in most cases, between the sound and the etymology. But the final e has long been silent, and has since been dropped from such terminations: the necessity for the k being thereby removed, that letter has gradually been dropped also: and now, be it right or wrong, domineering custom will have the k omitted, in spite of the remonstrances or protests of grammarians. It is generally agreed to write demoniac, prosaic, music, critic, &c. instead of demoniack, prosaick, musick, critick, &c. Words of one syllable, however, universally retain the ck, as stick, sick, &c. and for this reason: where a single letter forms a fourth or fifth part of a whole word, the eye is not easily reconciled to the loss of it. These will, therefore, probably continue to be written as they are at present: but some few larger words, which have held out something longer than their fellows, will, perhaps, in time suffer a similar retrenchment; as arrack, barrack, carrack, frolick, garlick, haddock, bullock, hemlock, hammock, shamrock, cassock, mattock, buttock, puttock. It is observable that the words in ock form the chief part of those which retain the k; and that none which retain it are of a greater length than two syllables. The objection to removing the k from monosyllables, operates in part upon dissyllables; but the very numerous polysyllables in ack and ick, which first invited the innovation, have swept away with them almost all the dissyllables of those forms. There are no polysyllables in ock; whence, I imagine, arises the difference with respect to that form. Words compounded with monosyllables ending in ck preserve that orthography; as candlestick, laughingstock, planetstruck. Nares's Elem. of Orthoepy, p. 91. This is certainly an ingenious illustration of making c a final letter in those words, which analogically require the added k as much as stick or sick. The k perhaps is not yet so wholly disused as is imagined: nor is it probable, I think, that attac will be used for attack; or ransac for ransack; or even bullock for bullock. Convenience and expedition have been the causes of "curtailing words" of this kind "of their fair proportion."]

Is uniform in its sound, as death, diligent.

It is used before r, as draw, dross; and w, as dwell.

F.

F, though having a name beginning with a vowel, it is numbered by the grammarians among the semivowels, yet has this quality of a mute, that it is commodiously sounded before a liquid, as flask, fly, freckle. It has an unvariable sound, except that of is sometimes spoken nearly as ov.

G.

G has two sounds, one hard, as in gay, go, gun; the other soft, as in gem, giant.

At the end of a word it is always hard, ring, snug, song, frog.

Before e and i the sound is uncertain.

G before e is soft, as gem, generation, except in gear, geld, geese, get, gewgaw, and derivatives from words ending in g, as singing, stronger, and generally before er at the end of words, as finger.

G is mute before n, as gnash, sign, foreign.

G before i is (g) hard, as give, except in giant, gigantick, gibbet, gibe, giblets, giles, gill, gilliflower, gin, ginger, gingle, to which may be added Egypt and gypsy.

Gh in the beginning of a word has the sound of the hard g, as ghostly; in the middle, and sometimes at the end, it is quite silent, as though, right, sought, spoken, tho', rite, soute.

(g) [To the exceptions of g, as hard before i, should be added the words which terminate in ize; as apologize, &c. See also the observations on this letter in the Dictionary.]

It has often at the end the sound of f, as laugh; whence laughter retains the same sound in the middle; cough, trough, sough, tough, enough, slough.

It is not to be doubted, but that in the original pronunciation gh had the force of a consonant, deeply guttural, which is still continued among the Scotch.

G is used before h, l, and r.

H.

H is a note of aspiration, and shews that the following vowel must be pronounced with a strong emission of the breath, as hat, horse.

It seldom begins any but the first syllable, in which it is always sounded with a full breath, except in heir, herb, hostler, honour, humble, honest, humour, and their derivatives.

It sometimes begins middle or final syllables in words compounded, as blockhead; or derived from the Latin, as comprehended.

J.

J consonant sounds uniformly like the soft g, and is therefore a letter useless, except in etymology, as ejaculation, jester, jocund, juice.

K.

K has the sound of hard c, and is used before e and i, where, according to English analogy, c would be soft, as kept, king, skirt, skeptick, for so it should be written. not sceptick, because sc is sounded like s, as in scene.

It is used before n, as knell, knot, but totally loses its sound in modern pronunciation.

K is (h) never doubled; but c is used before it to shorten the vowel by a double consonant, as cŏckle, pickle.

L.

L has in English the same liquid sound as in other languages.

The custom is to double the l at the end of monosyllables, as kill, will, full. These words were originally written kille, wille, fulle; and when the e first grew silent, and was afterwards omitted, the ll was retained, to give force, according to the analogy of our language, to the foregoing vowel.

L is sometimes mute, as in calf, half, halves, calves, could, would, should, psalm, talk, salmon, falcon.

The Saxons, who delighted in guttural sounds, sometimes aspirated the l at the beginning of words, as hlaf, a loaf, or bread; hlaford, a lord; but this pronunciation is now disused.

Le at the end of words is pronounced like a weak el, in which the e is almost mute, as table, shuttle.

M.

M has always the same sound, as murmur, monumental.

N.

N has (i) always the same sound, as noble, manners.

N is sometimes mute after m, as damn, condemn, hymn.

P.

P has always the same sound, which the Welsh and Germans confound with B.

P is sometimes mute, as in psalm, and between m and t, as tempt.

Ph is used for f in words derived from the Greek, as philosopher, philanthropy, Philip.

Q.

Q, as in other languages, is always followed by u, and has a sound which our Saxon ancestors well expressed by cp, cw, as quadrant, queen, equestrian, quilt, enquiry, quire, quotidian. Qu is never followed by u.

Qu is sometimes sounded, in words derived from the French, like k, as conquer, liquor, risque, chequer.

R.

R has the same rough snarling sound as in other tongues.

The Saxons used often to put h before it, as before l at the beginning of words.

Rh is used in words derived from the Greek, as myrrh, myrrhine, catarrhous, rheum, rheumatick, rhyme.

Re, at the end of some words derived from the Latin or French, is pronounced like a weak er, as theatre, sepulchre.

S.

S has a hissing sound, as sibilation, sister.

A single s seldom ends any word, except the third person of verbs, as loves, grows; and the plurals of nouns, as trees, bushes, distresses; the pronouns this, his, ours, yours, us; the adverb thus; and words derived from Latin, as rebus, surplus; the close being always either in se, as house, horse, or in ss, as grass, dress, bliss, less, anciently grasse, dresse.

S single, at the end of words, has a grosser sound, like that of z, as trees, eyes, except this, thus, us, rebus, surplus.

It sounds like z before ion, if a vowel goes before, as intrusion; and like s, if it follows a consonant, as conversion.

It sounds like z before e mute, as refuse, and before y final, as rosy; and in those words, bosom, desire, wisdom, prison, prisoner, présent, present, damsel, casement.

It is the peculiar quality of s, that it may be sounded before all consonants, except x and z, in which s is comprized, x being only ks, and z a hard or gross s. This s is therefore termed by grammarians suæ potestatis litera; the reason of which the learned Dr. Clarke erroneously supposed to be, that in some words it might be doubled at pleasure. Thus we find in several languages:

Σκέδννμι, scatter, sdegno, sdrucciolo, sfavellare, σφίγξ, sgombrare, sgranare, shake, slumber, smell, snipe, space, splendour, spring, squeeze, shrew, step, strength, stramen, stripe, sventura, swell.

T.

T has its customary sound, as take, temptation.

Ti before a vowel has the sound of si, as salvation, except an s goes before, as question, excepting likewise derivatives from words ending in ty, as mighty, mightier.

Th has two sounds; the one soft, as thus, whether; the other hard, as thing, think. The sound is soft in

(h) [Not now; but formerly the duplication of k was usual; as jakke for jack.]

(i) [Mr. Nares follows Wallis in giving two sounds to n, and in defining the difference of these sounds. One is thinner and harder, such as is heard in men, name, &c. which may be called its regular sound, and has been pronounced by Dr. Johnson its invariable one; the other duller, and something guttural, which is heard in king, thank, &c. For the former no rules are necessary: the latter takes place generally before the letters c hard, g hard, k, q, x, and also ch hard; as in uncle, uncle, hang, thank, rankle, banquet, conquer, phalanx, lynx, anchor, couch. See Elem. of Orth. p. 113.]

these words, then, thence, and there, with their derivatives and compounds; and in that, these, thou, thee, thy, thine, their, they, this, these, them, though, thus, and in all words between two vowels, as father, whether; and between r and a vowel, as burthen.

In other words it is hard, as thick, thunder, faith, faithful. Where it is softened at the end of a word, an e silent must be added, as breath, breathe; cloth, clothe.

V.

V has a sound of near affinity to that of f, vain, vanity.

From f in the Icelandick Alphabet, v is only distinguished by a diacritical point.

W.

Of w, which in diphthongs is often an undoubted vowel, some grammarians have (k) doubted whether it ever be a consonant: and not rather as it is called a double u or ou, as water may be resolved into ouater; but letters of the same sound are always reckoned consonants in other alphabets: and it may be observed, that w follows a vowel without any hiatus or difficulty of utterance, as frosty winter.

Wh has a sound accounted peculiar to the English, which the Saxons better expressed by hp, hw, as what, whence, whiting; in whore only, and sometimes in wholesome, wh is sounded like a simple h.

X.

X begins (l) no English word; it has the sound of ks, as axle, extraneous.

Y.

Y, when it follows a consonant, is a vowel; when it precedes either vowel or diphthong, is a consonant, ye, young. It is thought by some to be in all cases a vowel. But it may be observed of y as of w, that it follows a vowel without any hiatus, as rosy youth.

The chief (m) argument by which w and y appear to be always vowels is, that the sounds which they are supposed to have as consonants, cannot be uttered after a vowel, like that of all other consonants; thus we say, tu, ut; do, odd; but in wed, dew, the two sounds of w have no resemblance of each other.

Z.

Z begins no word originally English; it has the sound, as its name izzard or s hard expresses, of an s uttered with closer compression of the palate by the tongue, as freeze, froze.

(k) [See the remark on the letter y.]

(l) [None really English; but attempts have been made to anglicise a few words beginning with x. See the Dictionary.]

(m) [I confess I do not feel the full force of Dr. Johnson's argument; but a consideration of a contrary kind very strongly confirms me in my notion of the matter, namely, that these pretended vowel sounds cannot be uttered at all without the assistance of some vowel. Dwell is a word, but dwll cannot be pronounced; so also cyn, syn, syllables which do occur, must be given up as not to be spoken, unless we give to the y in them the sound of i, or some sound of a different nature from that which it has in youth, &c. It must be owned on the other hand, that this sound is very nearly allied to a vowel sound, since several vowels take it when rapidly pronounced. The effect of w is heard distinctly enough in the use of the letter q; but without some other vowel besides the attendant u, which seems there to have the power of w, nothing vocal would be formed: qurt, qulity, &c. are words which no one will attempt to utter; so that qu may perhaps be properly considered as a double consonant. We may add a further argument from Dr. Johnson himself; that w and y, as consonants, follow a vowel without any hiatus; as frosty winter, rosy youth. Nares, Elem. of Orthoep. p. 43.]

In orthography I have supposed orthoepy, or just utterance of words, to be included; orthography being only the art of expressing certain sounds by proper characters. I have therefore observed in what words any of the letters are mute.

Most of the writers of English grammar have given long tables of words pronounced otherwise than they are written, and seem not sufficiently to have considered, that of English, as of all living tongues, there is a double pronunciation, one cursory and colloquial, the other regular and solemn. The cursory pronunciation is always vague and uncertain, being made different in different mouths by negligence, unskilfulness, or affectation. The solemn pronunciation, though by no means immutable and permanent, is yet always less remote from the orthography, and less liable to capricious innovation. They have, however, generally formed their tables according to the cursory speech of those with whom they happened to converse, and concluding that the whole nation combines to vitiate language in one manner, have often established the jargon of the lowest of the people as the model of speech.

For pronunciation the best general rule is, to consider those as the most elegant speakers who deviate least from the written words.

There have been many schemes offered for the emendation and settlement of our orthography, which, like that of other nations, being formed by chance, or according to the fancy of the earliest writers in rude ages, was at first very various and uncertain, and is yet sufficiently irregular. Of these reformers some have endeavoured to accommodate orthography better to the pronunciation, without considering that this is to measure by a shadow, to take that for a model or standard which is changing while they apply it. Others, less absurdly indeed, but with equal unlikelihood of success, have endeavoured to proportion the number of letters to that of sounds, that every sound may have its own character, and every character a single sound. Such would be the orthography of a new language to be formed by a synod of grammarians upon principles of science. But who can hope to prevail on nations to change their practice, and make all their old books useless? or what advantage would a new orthography procure equivalent to the confusion and perplexity of such an alteration?

Some of these schemes I shall however exhibit, which may be used according to the diversities of genius, as a guide to reformers, or terrour to innovators.

One of the first who proposed a scheme of regular orthography, was (n) Sir Thomas Smith, secretary of state to Queen Elizabeth, a man of real learning, and much practised in grammatical disquisitions. Had he written the following lines according to his scheme, they would have appeared thus:

" At length Erasmus, that great injur'd name,
The glory of the priesthood, and the shame,
Stemm'd the wild torrent of a barb'rous age,
And drove those holy Vandals off the stage.

At lengƅ Erasmus, ƅat grët ïnjurd nâm,
Ae glorï of ƅe prësthüd, and ƅe zâm,
Stemmd ƅe wïld torrent of a barb'rous âz,
And dröv ƅös höli Vandals öff ƅe stâz."

After him another mode of writing was offered by Dr. Gil, or Gill (o) the celebrated master of St. Paul's school in London; which

(n) [His plan was to establish what he called correct writing of English, and the true sounding of the letters and words. This was endeavoured, according to Strype, about the year 1542. " So he framed twenty-nine letters; whereof nineteen were Roman, four Greek, and six English or Saxon. The five vowels he augmented into ten, distinguishing them into long and short; making certain accents over or on the side of them that were to be sounded. — He allowed no diphthongs nor double consonants; nor on any e's at the end of words, being not sounded." Strype, Life of Sir T. Smith, p. 27, 28. His Alphabet I have given in an Appendix to this Grammar. Not long after Sir Thomas's attempt, Sir John Cheke, who was then called one of the three great masters of the English tongue, (Sir T. Smith and Haddon being the other two,) expressed a wish to reform the orthography. This appears in a letter to Hoby, translator of Castiglione's Courtier, in 1557, at the end of the translation.]

(o) [The work of this learned person is extremely curious. The title is, " Logonomia Anglica, quâ Gentis sermo facilius addiscitur. Con-

I cannot represent exactly for want of types, but will approach as nearly as I can by means of characters now in use, so as to make it understood, exhibiting two stanzas of Spenser in the reformed orthography. [Dr. Johnson has exhibited a jargon, which the author does not countenance. I have cited the passage as it is in his work, p. 121.

" Unthankful wretch, said he, is this the meed,
With which her sovereign mercy thou dost quite?
Thy life she saved by her gracious deed;
But thou dost ween with villainous despight,
To blot her honour, and her heav'nly light.
Die, rather die, than so disloyally,
Deem of her high desert, or seem so light.
Fair death it is to shun more shame; then die.
Die, rather die, than ever love disloyally.
" But if to love disloyalty it be,
Shall I then hate her, that from deathes door
Me brought? ah! far be such reproach from me.
What can I less do, than her love therefore,
Sith I her due reward cannot restore?
Die, rather die, and dying do her serve,
Dying her serve, and living her adore.
Thy life she gave, thy life she doth deserve;
Die, rather die, than ever from her service swerve."— [" Unthankful wrech, said hï, iz ðis ðe mïd,

With which her soverain mersi ðou dust quit?
Ðj ljf shï saved bj her gräsius dîd;
But ðou dust mën with vilenus dispjt

Dr. Gill was followed by (p) Charles Butler, a man who did not want an understanding which might have qualified him for better employment. He seems to have been more sanguine than his predecessors, for he printed his book according to his own scheme; which the following specimen will make easily understood.

" But whensoever you have occasion to trouble their patience, or to come among them being troubled, it is better to stand upon your guard, than to trust to their gentleness. For the safeguard of your face, which they have most mind unto, provide a pursehood, made of coarse boultering, to be drawn and knit about your collar, which for more safety is to be lined against the eminent parts with woollen cloth. First cut a piece about an inch and a half broad, and half a yard long, to reach round by the temples and forehead, from one ear to the other; which being sowed in his place, join unto it two short pieces of the same breadth under the eyes, for the balls of the cheeks, and then set another piece about the breadth of a shilling against the top of the nose. At other times, when they are not angered, a little piece half a quarter broad, to cover the eyes and parts about them, may serve though it be in the heat of the day."

" Bet pensoëver you hav' occasion to trubble ðeir patienc' or to coom among ðem beeing trubled, it is better to stand upon your gard, ðan to trust to ðeir gentlenes. For ðe saf' gard of your fac', pic ðey hav' most mind' unto, provid' a pursehood, mad' of coorse boultering, to bee drawn and knit about your collar, pic for mor' saf'ty is to bee lined against ð' eminent parts wit woollen clot. First cut a peec' about an inc and a half broad, and half a yard long, to reac round by ðe temples and for'head, from one ear to ðe oðer; pic beeing sowed in his plac', join unto it two port peeces of the sam breadt under ðe eys, for the bals of ðe cheeks, and then set an oðer peec' about ðe breadt of a pilling against the top of ðe nose. At oðer tim's, pen ðey ar' not angered, a little piec' half a quarter broad, to cover ðe eys and parts about them, may serve ðowg it be in the heat of ðe day." Butler on the Nature and Properties of Bees, 1634.

In the time of Charles I. there was a very prevalent inclination to change the orthography; as appears, among other books, in such editions of the works of Milton as were published by himself. Of these reformers every man had his own scheme; but they agreed in one general design of accommodating the letters to the pronunciation, by ejecting such as they thought superfluous. Some of them would have written these lines thus:

——— All the erth
Shall then be paradis, far happier place
Than this of Eden, and far happier dais.

scripta ab Alexandro Gil, Paulinæ Scholæ Magistro Primario." A second edition of it was published in 1621. It is dedicated to king James; and in the dedication is the following animated passage respecting our language, written in the spirit of a true Englishman. " Edwardus tertius, quo nemo aut rebus gestis clarior extitit, aut prudentiâ illustrior, decrevit, Ne quis Gallicè aut in causis cognoscendis, aut in jure dicundo, loqueretur (consuetudine jam inde à Wilhelmo Normanno introductâ,) sed ut causarum cognitiones, sententiæ, et cætera acta, LINGUA ANGLICA, Latinâve inscriberentur. O si tanti principis curæ par populi amor respondisset! certè nec juriconsulti illa nomini Anglico injusta servitutis stigmata in hodiernum usque diem ostentarent; nec ab aliis gentibus malè audiret (ut barbara) LINGUA ANGLICA, quâ nulla, audeo dicere, nulla earum quæ nunc mortalibus in usu sunt, aut cultior, aut ornatior, aut ad omnia animi sensa explicanda aptior, aut facundior, invenietur. Obrepsêre fateor, in scriptione culpæ innumeræ, quibus discentium studia impediuntur: sed repetitis usque ab antiquitate majorum nostrorum characteribus, priorum temporum incuriâ intermissis: eas omnes ita restitui, ut quantumcunque rudis (perceptâ imprimis literarum prosodiâ) verum vocum nostrarum sonum, primo statim intuitu, possit accipere." I have placed his alphabet, as well as Sir Thomas Smith's, as a curiosity, in the Appendix to this Grammar. Dr. Gill notices the endeavours of his knightly predecessor, and of others, in regard to reforming our orthography, in these words. " Occurrere quidem huic vitio viri boni et literati, sed irrito conatu; ex equestri ordine Thomas Smithus, cui volumen benè magnum opposuit Rich. Mulcasterus; qui, post magnam temporis et bonæ chartæ perditionem, omnia consuetudini tanquam tyranno permittenda censet. Unum in equite jure reprehendit, quòd novi ejus characteres nec aspectu grati sunt, nec scriptu faciles. Huic malo, quoad potuit, subvenit è fecialibus unus, qui eorum more ex gradu officii nomen sibi Chester assumpsit. Sed ille præterquam quòd nonnullas literas ad usum pernecessarias omisit, sermonem nostrum characteribus suis non sequi sed ducere meditabatur. Multa omitto.—Bullokerus, ut paucula mutavit, sic multa fideliter emendavit. Atque hi sunt, quos scio Orthografiæ nomen suum publicè professos esse."—John Hart, Chester herald, published " An Orthographie, &c. how to write or paint the image of mannes voice moste like to the life or nature," in 1569; which is the book, I suppose that Gill means Bullokar's " Booke for the Amendment of Orthographie for English Speech" was published in 1580; Mulcaster's, " On the Right Writing of our English Tongue," in 1582. In 1590, a plain " Order of Orthographie" appeared in the second book of " The Writing Schoolemaster," by Peter Bales; " shewing the perfect method to write true orthographie in our English tongue, as it is now generally printed, used, and allowed, of the best and most learned writers." A sonnet of encouragement to the author, by " Thomas Lodge, gentleman," is prefixed; whose pen, in various compositions, has written many strains of elegance.

" There needs no ivie, where the wine is good;
Nor queint discourse, where judgement leads the pen;
Nor forced praise, where science spreads the sail.
Then, gentle Bales, despise the scoffing brood;
Thy booke hath past the eyes of learned men,
And shall supplie this soyle with sweete availe.
Truth needs no foile; but triumphs in desart:
A wanton flourish never dwells with art."]

(p) [Butler's book is entitled " The English Grammar, or the Institution of Letters, Syllables, and Words, in the English Tongue. Whereunto is annexed an Index of Words Like and Unlike. By Charles Butler, Magd. Master of Arts, Oxford, 1633." Of Gill he speaks with pleasure, pursuing in some degree his plan; and thus, in his Preface, confidently speaks of the value, and little doubts the admission of what he offers. " So powerful is the tyrant custome, opposing and overswaying right and reason; that I doe easily beleeve, this little change, though never so right, reasonable, and profitable, will seeme to some harsh and unked at the first: but after a while, being a little inured thereunto, I suppose they will rather wonder, how our ancient, eloquent, noble language, in other respects equalizing the best, could so long endure these grosse and disgraceful barbarismes."]

Bishop Wilkins afterwards, in his great work of the philosophical language, proposed, without expecting to be followed, a regular orthography; by which the Lord's prayer is to be written thus:

Yar Fádher heitsh art in héven, halloed bi dhyi nám, dhyi cingdým cým, dhy eill bi dýn in erth as it is in héven, &c.

We have (q) since had no general reformers; but some ingenious men have endeavoured to deserve well of their country, by (r) writing honor and labor for honour and labour, red for read in the preter tense, sais for say, repete for repeat, explane for explain, or declame for declaim. Of these it may be said, that as they have done no good, they have done little harm; both because they have innovated little, and because few have followed them.

The English language has properly no dialects: the style of writers has no professed diversity in the use of words, or of their flexions, and terminations, nor differs but by different degrees of skill or care. The oral diction is uniform in no spacious country, but has less variation in England than in most other nations of equal extent. The language of the northern counties retains many words now out of use, but which are commonly of the genuine Teutonick race, and is uttered with a pronunciation which now seems harsh and rough, but was probably used by our ancestors. The northern speech is therefore not barbarous but obsolete. The speech in the western provinces seems to differ from the general diction rather by a depraved pronunciation, than by any real difference which letters would express.

ETYMOLOGY.

ETYMOLOGY teaches the deduction of one word from another, and the various modifications by which the sense of the same word is diversified; as horse, horses; I love, I loved.

Of the ARTICLE.

The English have two articles, an or a, and the.

AN. A.

A has an indefinite signification, and means one, with some reference to more; as This is a good book, that is, one among the books that are good. He was killed by a sword, that is, some sword. This is a better book for a man

(q) [This is a great mistake. Dr. Johnson knew not of the volume called "Ars signorum, vulgò Character Universalis et Lingua Philosophica, quâ poterunt homines diversissimorum idiomatum, spatio duarum septimanarum, omnia animi sua sensa in rebus familiaribus non minus intelligibiliter, sive scribendo, sive loquendo, mutuò communicare, quam linguis propriis vernaculis, &c." Lond. 1661. The author of this work is George Dalgarno, whom bishop Wilkins himself and other learned men countenanced. His project, though now forgotten, is extremely ingenious; and for the adoption of it the strongest reasons, which it is possible to urge, have been offered. It received indeed both academical and the highest public sanction. And the following Proclamation, which precedes the work, will confirm what I have said.

" CHARLES R.

" Whereas we have been informed by the testimonies of divers learned men from both the universities of our kingdom of England, (R. Love, DD. J. Wilkins, DD. J. Wallis, DD. S. Ward, DD. W. Dillingham, DD.) concerning the great pains taken by George Dalgarno, in a scholastick and literary design of an Universal Character and Philosophical Character; all of them approving and commending his discovery, judging it to be of singular use for the facilitating the matter of communication and intercourse between people of different languages, and consequently a proper and effectual means for advancing all the parts of real and useful knowledge, civilizing barbarous nations, propagating the gospel, and encreasing traffique and commerce: We understanding moreover, by certificates from several credible persons, that through the various vicissitudes of Providence he hath suffered the loss of a considerable estate, by reason whereof he is wholly disinabled from affording that charge and expence for the effectual prosecuting of this work, as the nature of it requires: We therefore out of a tender consideration of the premises, and for manifesting our good will and affection towards the promoting of art and the encouraging all such ingenious persons of our subjects who shall attempt and effect any thing tending to publike good; as, We do declare, that We will Ourselves express some token of Our Royal Favour for the helping forward this so laudable and hopeful enterprize; so also, reflecting upon its common and universal usefulness, We do by these our Letters of Recommendation, incite as many of our subjects (especially the reverend and learned clergy) as are truly apprehensive and sensible of the defectiveness of art chiefly in this particular of language; what great loss mankind is at therethrough; how acceptable it will be before God, and praise-worthy among men, to encourage and advance those waies of learning wherein the general good of mankind is intended; that such would, as their affections shall encline them and their places enable them, put their helping hands to the bringing forth this (as yet) infant design, now sticking in the birth. This will give just cause to Our posterity through succeeding generations, while they are reaping the fruit of Our ingeny and industry, to look back upon Us with reverence; And from Our example they will be provoked not to rest upon what they shall have received from us, but still to be endeavouring to proceed in a further repairing the decayes of nature, untill art have done its last, or, which is more probable, nature cease to be, or be renewed.

" Given at our Court at Whitehal this 26th of November, in the 12th year of Our Reign."]

(r) [It is surprising, that Dr. Johnson should have been a stranger to "Friendly Advice to the Correctour of the English Press at Oxford concerning the English Orthographie." fol. Lond. 1682. It exhibits the very forms which Dr. Johnson, in opposition to most modern writers adopts and vindicates; and it would have abundantly pleased him, as the following citations from it will shew. The work is moreover curious, as it points out the time when the final k, in all our words, (for which Dr. Johnson strenuously contends,) was first systematically disregarded, and the books in which the innovation commenced.

" I confess I am not much versed in the English prints at Oxford. I have only seen a Bible in quarto there printed; but never read one page in it, as being unwilling to read so sacred a volume, where I should be sure to meet with many errours, though but grammatical. But I have been told by a principal bookseller in London, that men would not buy that impression, for your heterodox spelling found therein. I am better acquainted with two other books printed at Oxford; the one named The Ladies Calling, the other The Government of the Tongue: in which I do not pretend to instance in half the cacographies there found, but such few as the entrance into them offers to every eye." p. 5. The writer presently observes, " Now am I to touch your alteration by way of defect: and first, in the middle of words, where first I note your great spite or skill against diphthongs, generally turning words derived from the Latine into the Latine tongue again: as editor (intended for an English word but spoiled in the making) for editour; and writing color for colour; and humor for humour. And the vein being on you, you could not stop there, but venture to do the like to words properly English; as neighbor for neighbour, and mold for mould." p. 6. " I come next to shew how you have injuriously and shamefully docked English words, by taking from the end of them: — as, for example, writing diabolic, topic, stomac, public, instead of the known words diabolick, topick, publick; or, as sometimes they were written, diabolique, topique, publique; but never, but from Oxford, with a c terminating them: unless from France, where I find them so spelt: But what have we to do to conforme our English to their language? — But being almost as much tired in writing, as I may suppose you may be in reading this, I shall only mention your masterpiece of refining or reforming our language, in constant writing tho for though, and thro for through, in The Government of the Tongue! Being but parts of words, they can signify nothing at all, standing by themselves." pp. 7, 8.

The ambition to change our orthography, in those instances which Dr. Johnson has noticed and which might be enlarged, strongly possessed the late bishop Newton, and Benson the commentator on the epistles of St. Paul. No general reformer, however, appeared till about the year 1791, when Mr. James Elphinston, a man of considerable learning, attempted to represent in the spelling the sounds pronounced, and published in several volumes the specimens of a system vainly raised to overturn the whole form of the language.

The orthography of numerous words is certainly still unsettled. But custom, to the tyranny of which Dr. Gill and Charles Butler (as we have seen) disdained to bow, will be obeyed. Custom is against the final k of Johnson and our ancestors; custom rejects the u from his authour, and terrour, and superiour, though not generally from labour, honour, and favour; custom is more in favour of ancient than antient; custom omits the e in judgement, in abridgement, and in acknowledgement, while in arrangement, in management, in enlargement, in revengement, in changeable, in encouragement, in allegement, it has not dared to hazard the improper omission; custom prefers vicious to vitious, enlarge to inlarge, negociate to negotiate. The rules of grammarians, and the analogy of language, however just and indisputable, custom overleaps without thought; and is maintained in its usurpation without enquiry.] than a boy, that is, for one of those that are men than one of those that are boys. An army might enter without resistance, that is, any army.

In the senses in which we use a or an in the singular, we speak in the plural without an article; as, these are good books.

I have made an the original article, because it is only the Saxon an, or æn, one, applied to a new use, as the German ein, and the French un; the n being cut off before a consonant in the speed of utterance.

Grammarians of the last age direct, that an should be used before h; whence it appears that the English anciently aspirated less. An is still used before the silent h, as an herb, an honest man: but otherwise a; as,

A horse, a horse, my kingdom for a horse.
Shakspeare.

An or a can only be joined with a singular, the correspondent plural is the noun without an article, as I want a pen, I want pens: or with the pronominal adjective some, as I want some pens.

Brought death into the world. Milton.

That is that particular fruit, and this world in which we live. So He giveth fodder for the cattle, and green herbs for the use of man; that is, for those beings that are cattle, and his use that is man.

The is used in both numbers.

I am as free as Nature first made man,
Ere the base laws of servitude began,
When wild in woods the noble savage ran. Dryden.

Many words are used without articles; as

1. Proper names, as John, Alexander, Longinus, Aristarchus, Jerusalem, Athens, Rome, London. GOD is used as a proper name.

2. Abstract names, as blackness, witchcraft, virtue, vice, beauty, ugliness, love, hatred, anger, goodnature, kindness.

3. Words in which nothing but the mere being of any thing is implied: This is not beer, but water; This is not brass, but steel.

Of NOUNS SUBSTANTIVE.

The relations of English nouns to words going before or following are not expressed by cases, or changes of termination, but as in most of the other European languages, by prepositions, unless we may be said to have a genitive case.

	Singular.
Nom.	Magister,	a Master, the Master.
Gen.	Magistri,	of a Master, of the Master, or Masters, the Masters.
Dat.	Magistro,	to a Master, to the Master.
Acc.	Magistrum,	a Master, the Master.
Voc.	Magister,	Master, O Master.
Abl.	Magistro,	from a Master, from the Master.

	Plural.
Nom.	Magistri,	Masters, the Masters.
Gen.	Magistrorum,	of Masters of the Masters.
Dat.	Magistris,	to Masters, to the Masters.
Acc.	Magistros,	Masters, the Masters.
Voc.	Magistri,	Masters, O Masters.
Abl.	Magistris,	from Masters, from the Masters.

Our nouns are therefore only declined thus:

Master,	Gen. Masters.	Plur. Masters.
Scholar,	Gen. Scholars.	Plur. Scholars.

These genitives are always written with a mark of elision, master's, scholar's, according to an opinion long received, that the 's is a contraction of his, as the soldier's valour, for the soldier his valour; but this cannot be the true original, because 's is put to female nouns, Woman's beauty; the Virgin's delicacy; Haughty Juno's unrelenting hate; and collective nouns, as Women's passions; the rabble's insolence; the multitude's folly; in all these cases it is apparent that his cannot be understood. We say likewise the foundation's strength, the diamond's lustre, the winter's severity; but in these cases his may be understood, he and his having formerly been applied to neuters in the place now supplied by it and its.

The learned and sagacious Wallis, to whom every English grammarian owes a tribute of reverence, calls this modification of the noun an adjective possessive; I think with no more propriety than he might have applied the same to the genitive in equitum decus, Trojæ oris, or any other Latin genitive. Dr. Lowth, on the other part, supposes the possessive pronouns mine and thine to be genitive cases.

This termination of the noun seems to constitute a real genitive indicating possession. It is derived to us from those who declined ꝑmiꝺ, a smith; Gen. ꝑmiꝺeꝛ, of a smith; Plur. ꝑmiꝺeꝛ, or ꝑmiꝺaꝛ, smiths; and so in two other of their seven declensions.

It is a further confirmation of this opinion, that in the old poets both the genitive and plural were longer by a syllable than the original word; knitis, for knight's in Chaucer; leavis, for leaves, in Spenser.

When a word ends in s, the genitive may be the (s) same with the nominative, as Venus temple.

The plural is formed by adding s, as table, tables; fly, flies; sister, sisters; wood, woods; or es where s could not otherwise be sounded, as after ch, s, sh, x, z; after c sounded like s, and g like j; the mute e is vocal before s, as lance, lances, outrage, outrages.

The formation of the plural and genitive singular is the same.

A few words yet make the plural in n, as men, women, oxen, swine, and more anciently eyen and shoon. This formation is that which generally prevails in the Teutonick dialects.

Words that end in f commonly form their plural by ves, as loaf, loaves; calf, calves.

Except a few, muff, muffs; chief, chiefs. So hoof, roof, proof, relief, mischief, puff, cuff, dwarf, handkerchief, grief.

Irregular plurals are teeth from tooth, lice from louse, mice from mouse, geese from goose, feet from foot, dice from die, pence from penny, brethren from brother, children from child.

Plurals ending in s have for the most part no genitives; but we say, Womens excellencies, and Weigh the mens wits against the ladies hairs. Pope.

Dr. Wallis thinks the Lords house may be said for the house of Lords; but such phrases are not now in use; and surely an English ear rebels against them. They would commonly produce a troublesome ambiguity, as the Lords house may be the house of Lords, or the house of a Lord. Besides that the mark of elision is improper, for in the Lords' house nothing is cut off.

(s) [The apostrophe, however, for the sake of distinction, should be, and I think now generally is, used; as Venus' temple, others' good, &c.]

Some English substantives, like those of many other languages, change their termination as they express different sexes, as prince, princess; actor, actress; lion, lioness; hero, heroine. To these mentioned by Dr. Lowth may be added arbitress, poetess, chauntress, duchess, tigress, governess, tutress, peeress, authoress, traitress, and perhaps others. Of these variable terminations we have only a sufficient number to make us feel our want, for when we say of a woman that she is a philosopher, an astronomer, a builder, a weaver, a dancer, we perceive an impropriety in the termination which we cannot avoid; but we can say that she is an architect, a botanist, a student, because these terminations have not annexed to them the notion of sex. In words which the necessities of life are often requiring, the sex is distinguished not by different terminations, but by different names, as a bull, a cow; a horse, a mare; equus, equa; a cock, a hen; and sometimes by pronouns prefixed, as a he-goat, a she-goat.

Of Adjectives.

Adjectives in the English language are wholly indeclinable; having neither case, gender, nor number, and being added to substantives in all relations without any change; as, a good woman, good women, of a good woman; a good man, good men, of good men.

The Comparison of Adjectives.

The (t) comparative degree of adjectives is formed by adding er, the superlative by adding est, to the positive; as fair, fair*er,* fair*est; lovely,* lovel*ier,* lovel*iest; sweet,* sweet*er,* sweet*est; low,* low*er,* low*est; high,* high*er,* high*est.*

Some words are irregularly compared; as good, better, best; bad, worse, worst; little, less, least; near, nearer, next; much, more, most; many (or moe), more (for moer), most (for moest); late, latter, latest or last.

Some comparatives form a superlative by adding most, as nether, nethermost; outer, outmost; under, undermost; up, upper, uppermost; fore, former, foremost.

Most is sometimes added to a substantive, as topmost, southmost.

Many adjectives do not admit of comparison by terminations, and are only compared by more and most, as benevolent, more benevolent, most benevolent.

All adjectives may be compared by (u) more and most, even when they have comparatives and superlatives regularly formed; as fair, fairer, or more fair; fairest, or most fair.

In adjectives that admit a regular comparison, the comparative more is oftener used than the superlative most, as more fair, is oftener written for fairer, than most fair for fairest.

The comparison of adjectives is very uncertain; and being much regulated by commodiousness of utterance, or agreeableness of sound, is not easily reduced to rules.

Monosyllables are commonly compared.

Polysyllables, or words of more than two syllables, are seldom compared otherwise than by more and most, as deplorable, more deplorable, most deplorable.

Dissyllables are seldom compared if they terminate in some, as fulsome, toilsome; in ful, as careful, spleenful, dreadful; in ing, as trifling, charming; in ous, as porous; in less, as careless, harmless; in ed, as wretched; in id, as candid; in al, as mortal; in ent, as recent, fervent; in ain, as certain; in ive, as missive; in dy, as woody; in fy, puffy; in ky, as rocky, except lucky; in my, as roomy; in ny, as skinny; in py, as ropy, except happy; in ry, as hoary.

Some comparatives and superlatives are yet found in good writers formed without regard to the foregoing rules: but in a language subjected so little and so lately to grammar, such anomalies must frequently occur.

So shady is compared by Milton.

> She in shadiest covert hid,
> Tun'd her nocturnal note. Parad. Lost.

And virtuous.

> What she wills to say or do,
> Seems wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best. Parad. Lost.

So trifling, by Ray, who is indeed of no great authority.

> It is not so decorous, in respect of God, that he should immediately do all the meanest and triflingest things himself, without making use of any inferior or subordinate minister.
> Ray on the Creation.

Famous, by Milton.

> I shall be named among the famousest
> Of women sung at solemn festivals. Milton's Agonistes.

Inventive, by Ascham.

> Those have the inventivest heads for all purposes, and roundest tongues in all matters. Ascham's Schoolmaster.

Mortal, by Bacon.

> The mortalest poisons practised by the West Indians, have some mixture of the blood, fat, or flesh of man. Bacon.

Natural, by Wotton.

> I will now deliver a few of the properest and naturallest considerations that belong to this piece. Wotton's Architecture.

Wretched, by Jonson.

> The wretcheder are the contemners of all helps; such as presuming on their own naturals, deride diligence, and mock at terms when they understand not things. Ben Jonson.

Powerful, by Milton.

> We have sustain'd one day in doubtful fight,
> What heav'n's great King hath pow'rfullest to send > Against us from about his throne. Paradise Lost.

The termination in ish may be accounted in some sort a degree of comparison, by which the signification is diminished below the positive, as black, blackish, or tending to blackness; salt, saltish, or having a little taste of salt: they therefore admit no comparison. This termination is seldom added but to words expressing sensible qualities, nor often to words of above one syllable, and is scarcely in use in the solemn or sublime style.

Of Pronouns.

Pronouns in the English language are, I, thou, he, with their plurals we, ye, they; it, who, which, what, whether, whosoever, whatsoever, my, mine, our, ours, thy, thine, your, yours, his, her, hers, their, theirs, this, that, other, another, the same, some.

The Pronouns personal are irregularly inflected.

	Singular.	Plural.
Nom.	I	We
Accus. and other oblique cases.	Me	Us
Nom.	Thou	Ye
Oblique.	Thee	You.

You is commonly used in modern writers for ye, particularly in the language of ceremony, where the second person plural is used for the second person singular, You are my friend.

(t) [This addition of er is purely Saxon; in which language ep, epe, ap, æpe, ip, op, and yp, are forms of the comparative degree, as ept, apt, æpt, opt, upt, and ypt, are of the superlative.]

(u) [Formerly a double degree of comparison was used, however ungrammatical it may seem, and however harsh it may sound; as most basest by Sir Thomas More; most affablest by Ben Jonson; most straitest, Acts, xxvi. 5.; more braver by Shakspeare. We retain Most Highest as distinctly and justly applicable to the Creator of heaven and earth.]

	Singular.	Plural.
Nom.	He	They	Applied to masculines.
Oblique.	Him	Them
Nom.	She	They	Applied to feminines.
Oblique.	Her	Them
Nom.	It	They	Applied to neuters or things.
Oblique.	Its	Them

For it the practice of ancient writers was to use he, and for its, his.

The possessive pronouns, like other adjectives, are without cases or change of termination.

The possessive of the first person is my, mine, our, ours; of the second, thy, thine, your, yours; of the third, from he, his, from she, her, and hers, and in the plural their, theirs, for both sexes.

Our, yours, hers, theirs, are used when the substantive preceding is separated by a verb, as These are our books. These books are ours. Your children excel ours in stature, but ours surpass yours in learning.

(v) Ours, yours, hers, theirs, notwithstanding their seeming plural termination, are applied equally to singular and plural substantives, as This book is ours. These books are ours.

Mine and thine were formerly used before a vowel, as mine amiable lady; which though now disused in prose, might be still properly continued in poetry, they are used as ours and yours, and are referred to a substantive preceding, as thy house is larger than mine, but my garden is more spacious than thine.

Their and theirs are the possessives likewise of they, when they is the plural of it, and are therefore applied to things.

Pronouns relative are who, which, what, whether, whosoever, whatsoever.

	Sing. and Plur.		Sing. and Plur.
Nom.	Who	Nom.	Which
Gen.	Whose	Gen.	Of which, or whose
Other oblique cases.	Whom	Other oblique cases.	Which.

Who is now used in relation to persons, and which in relation to things; but they were anciently confounded. At least it was common to say, the man which, though I remember no example of, the thing who.

Whose is rather the poetical than the regular genitive of which.

> The fruit
> Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
> Brought death into the world. Milton.

Whether is only used in the nominative and accusative cases; and has no plural, being applied only to one of a number, commonly to one of two, as, Whether of these is left I know not. Whether shall I choose? It is now almost obsolete.

What, whether relative or interrogative, is without variation.

Whosoever, whatsoever, being compounded of who or what, and soever, follow the rule of their primitives.

	Singular.	Plural.
In all cases,	This	These
	That	Those
	Others	Others.
	Whether

(v) [Dr. Johnson omits the apostrophe generally used; as our's, your's, &c. There seems indeed to have been no necessity for the added s; our, your, &c. including in themselves the idea of property or possession.]

The plural (w) others is not used but when it is referred to a substantive preceding, as I have sent other horses. I have not sent the same horses, but others.

Another, being only an other, has no plural. (x)

Here, there, and where, joined with certain particles, have a relative and pronominal use. Hereof, herein, hereby, hereafter, herewith, thereof, therein, thereby, thereupon, therewith, whereof, wherein, whereby, whereupon, wherewith, which signify of this, in this, &c. of that, in that, &c. of which, in which, &c.

Therefore and wherefore, which are properly there for and where for, for that, for which, are now reckoned conjunctions, and continued in use. The rest seem to be passing by degrees into neglect, though proper, useful, and analogous. They are referred both to singular and plural antecedents.

There are two more words used only in conjunction with pronouns, own, and self.

Own is added to possessives, both singular and plural, as my own hand, our own house. It is emphatical, and implies a silent contrariety or opposition; as, I live in my own house, that is, not in a hired house. This I did with my own hand, that is, without help, or not by proxy.

Self is added to possessives, as myself, yourselves; and sometimes to personal pronouns, as himself, itself, themselves. It then, like own expresses emphasis and opposition, as I did this myself, that is, not another; or it forms a reciprocal pronoun, as We hurt ouselves by vain rage.

Himself, itself, themselves, is supposed by Wallis to be put by corruption, for his self, it self, their selves; so that self is always a substantive. This seems justly observed, for we say, He came himself; Himself shall do this; where (y) himself cannot be an accusative.

Of the VERB.

English verbs are (z) active, as I love; or neuter, as I languish. The neuters are formed like the actives.

Most verbs signifying action may likewise signify condition or habit, and become neuters, as I love, I am in love; I strike, I am now striking.

Verbs have only two tenses inflected in their terminations, the present, and simple preterite: the other tenses are compounded of the auxiliary verbs, have, shall, will, let, may, can, and the infinitive of the active or neuter verb.

(w) [Anciently other was the plural: "They are taken out of the way as all other." Job, xxiv. 24. "And leave their riches for other." Ps. Comm. Pr. xlix. 10.]

(x) [Each and either are placed in the Dictionary by Dr. Johnson as pronouns; but are here omitted. They are distributive pronouns, because they relate to persons or things that make up a number; the former including every individual of any number referred to; the latter, implying one or the other, and is opposed to neither; which also is a pronoun here unnoticed and means not either. Some have therefore considered none, i. e. not one, as a negative pronoun, which Dr. Johnson pronounces an adjective; and formerly none was prefixed where now we use no.]

(y) [Himself, thus used, is certainly not proper. The Saxons used he ſylf, i. e. he himself.]

(z) [Neuter verbs denote an action in the agent: active verbs denote an action on an object. The former require no accusative case after them; the latter absolutely require it, either expressed or understood.]

The passive voice is formed by joining the participle preterite to the substantive verb, as I am loved.

Plur. We shall have had; ye shall have had; they shall have had.

Potential.

The potential form of speaking is expressed by may, can, in the present; and might, could, or should in the preterite, joined with the infinitive mood of the verb.

There is likewise a double Preterite.

Sing. I should have had; thou shouldst have had; he should have had;
Plur. We should have had; ye should have had; they should have had.

In like manner we use, I might have had; I could have had, &c.

Participle present. Having. Participle preter. Had.

Verb Active. To Love.

Plur. Let us love; love, or love ye; let them love.

(a) [The preposition to, [in Dutch written toe and tot, a little nearer to the original,] is the Gothic substantive taui, or tauhts, i. e. act, effect, result, consummation. Which Gothic substantive is indeed itself no other than the past participle, tauid, or tauids, of the verb taujan, agere. And what is done, is terminated, ended, finished. In the Teutonic, this verb is written tuan or tuon, whence the modern German thun, and its preposition, varying like its verb, tu. In the Anglo-Saxon the verb is teogan, and preposition to. After this derivation, it will not appear in the least mysterious, or wonderful, that we should, in a peculiar manner, in English, prefix this same word to to the infinitive of our verbs. For the verbs in English not being distinguished, as in other languages, by a peculiar termination; and it being sometimes impossible to distinguish them by their place, when the old termination of the Anglo-Saxon verbs was dropped, this word to, i. e. act, became necessary to be prefixed, in order to distinguish them from nouns, and to invest them with the verbal character: for there is no difference between the noun love, and the verb to love, but what must be comprized in the prefix to. The infinitive, therefore, appears plainly to be, what the Stoics called it, the very verb itself. Mr. Horne Tooke, Div. of Purley, i. 350.]

Conjunctive. Present.

Sing. I love; thou love: he love:
Plur. We love; ye love; they love.

Infinitive.

Present. To love. Preterite. To have loved.
Participle present. Loving. Participle past. Loved.

The passive is formed by the addition of the participle preterite, to the different tenses of the verb to be, which must therefore be here exhibited.

Indicative. Present.

Sing. (b) I am; thou art; he is;
Plur. We are, or be; ye are, or be; they are, or be.
The plural be is now little in use.

Preterite.

Sing. (c) I was; thou wast, or wert; he was;
Plur. We were; ye were; they were.
Wert is properly of the conjunctive mood, and ought not to be used in the indicative.

Infinitive.

Present. To be loved. Preterite. To have been loved.
Participle. Loved.

There is another form of English verbs, in which the infinitive mood is joined to the verb do in its various inflections, which are therefore to be learned in this place.

To Do.

Indicative. Present.

Sing. I do; thou dost; he doth;
Plur. We do; ye do; they do.

Preterite.

Sing. I did; thou didst; he did;
Plur. We did; ye did; they did.
Preterite, &c. I have done, &c. I had done, &c.
Future. I shall or will do, &c.

Imperative.

Sing. Do thou; let him do;
Plur. Let us do; do ye; let them do.

Conjunctive. Present.

Sing. I do; thou do; he do;
Plur. We do; ye do; they do.
The rest are as in the indicative.

Infinitive. To do; to have done.
Participle pres. Doing. Participle preter. Done.

Do is sometimes used superfluously, as, I do love, I did love: simply for I love, or I loved; but this is considered as a vitious mode of speech.

It is sometimes used emphatically; as,

> I do love thee, and when I love thee not,
> Chaos is come again. Shakspeare.

It is frequently joined with a negative; as, I like her, but I do not love her; I wished him success, but did not help him. This, by custom at least, appears more easy, than the other form of expressing the same sense by a negative adverb after the verb, I like her, but love her not.

The Imperative prohibitory is seldom applied in the second person, at least, in prose, without the word do; as, Stop him, but do not hurt him; Praise beauty, but do not dote on it.

Its chief use is in interrogative forms of speech, in which it is used through all the persons; as, Do I live? Dost thou strike me? Do they rebel? Did I complain? Didst thou love her? Did she die? So likewise in nega-

(b) [Formerly in the singular as well as plural, be was used; of which usage Shakspeare and Ben Jonson furnish proofs. But, like the plural be, it is now rarely employed, except by rusticks.]

(c) [It is ungrammatical to say or to write you was; yet some of our best writers have occasionally committed this mistake. Was belongs to the first and third persons singular, I was, he was; and therefore cannot properly be joined to the second person plural: it would be just as correct to use you is for you are, as you was for you were; which the most vulgar only would utter.]

tive interrogations; Do I not yet grieve? Did she not die?

Do and did are thus used only for the present and simple preterite.

There is another manner of conjugating neuter verbs, which, when it is used, may not improperly denominate them neuter passives, as they are inflected according to the passive form by the help of the verb substantive to be. They answer nearly to the reciprocal verbs in French; as,

I am risen, surrexi, Latin; Je me suis levé, French.
I was walked out, exieram; Je m'étois promené.

In like manner we commonly express the present tense; as, I am going, eo. I am grieving, doleo. She is dying, illa moritur. The tempest is raging, furit procella. I am pursuing an enemy, hostem insequor. So the other tenses, as, We were walking, ἐτυγχάνομεν περιπατοῦντες, I have been walking, I had been walking, I shall or will be walking.

There is another manner of using the active participle, which gives it a passive signification; as, The grammar is now printing, grammatica jam nunc chartis imprimitur. The brass is forging, æra excuduntur. This is, in my opinion, a vitious expression, probably corrupted from a phrase more pure, but now somewhat obsolete: The book is a printing, The brass is a forging; a being properly at, and printing and forging verbal nouns signifying action, according to the analogy of this language.

The indicative and conjunctive moods are by modern writers frequently confounded, or rather the conjunctive is wholly neglected, when some convenience of versification does not invite its revival. It is used among the purer writers of former times after if, though, ere, before, till or until, whether, except, unless, whatsoever, whomsoever, and words of wishing; as Doubtless thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not.

Of Irregular Verbs.

The English verbs were divided by Ben Jonson into four conjugations, without any reason arising from the nature of the language, which has properly but one conjugation, such as has been exemplified; from which all deviations are to be considered as anomalies, which are indeed in our monosyllable Saxon verbs and the verbs derived from them very frequent; but almost all the verbs which have been adopted from other languages follow the regular form.

Our verbs are observed by Dr. Wallis to be irregular only in the formation of the preterite, and its participle. Indeed, in the scantiness of our conjugations there is scarcely any other place for irregularity.

The first irregularity, is a slight deviation from the regular form, by rapid utterance or poetical contraction: the last syllable ed is often joined with the former by suppression of e; as, lov'd for loved; after c, ch, sh, f, k, x, and after the consonants s, th, when more strongly pronounced, and sometimes after m, n, r, if preceded by a short vowel, t is used in pronunciation, but very seldom in writing, rather than d; as plac't, snatch't, fish't, wak't, dwel't, smel't; for plac'd, snatch'd, fish'd, wak'd, dwel'd, smel'd; or placed, snatched, fished, waked, dwelled, smelled.

Those words which terminate in l or ll, or p, make their preterite in t, even in solemn language; as, crept, felt, dwelt; sometimes after x, ed is changed into t; as, vext: this is not constant.

A long vowel is often changed into a short one; thus, kept, slept, wept, crept, swept; from the verbs, to keep, to sleep, to weep, to creep, to sweep.

Where d or t go before, the additional letter d or t, in this contracted form, coalesce into one letter with the radical d or t: if t were the radical, they coalesce into t; but if d were the radical, then into d or t, as the one or the other letter may be more easily pronounced: as, read, led, spread, shed, shred, bid, hid, chid, fed, bled, bred, sped, strid, rid; from the verbs to read, to lead, to spread, to shed, to shred, to bid, to hide, to chide, to feed, to bleed, to breed, to speed, to stride, to slide, to ride. And thus, cast, hurt, cost, burst, eat, beat, sweat, sit, quit, smit, writ, bit, hit, met, shot; from the verbs, to cast, to hurt, to cost, to burst, to eat, to beat, to sweat, to sit, to quit, to smite, to write, to bite, to hit, to meet, to shoot. And in like manner, lent, sent, rent, girt; from the verbs, to lend, to send, to rend, to gird.

The participle preterite or passive is often formed in en, instead of ed; as, been, taken, given, slain, known, from the verbs to be, to take, to give, to slay, to know.

Many words have two or more participles, as not only written, bitten, eaten, beaten, hidden, chidden, shotten, chosen, broken; but likewise writ, bit, eat, beat, hid, chid, shot, chose, broke, are promiscuously used in the participle, from the verbs to write, to bite, to eat, to beat, to hide, to chide, to shoot, to choose, to break, and many such like.

In the same manner sown, shewn, hewn, mown, loaden, laden, as well as sow'd, shew'd, hew'd, mow'd, loaded, laded, from the verbs to sow, to shew, to hew, to mow, to load, or lade.

Concerning these double participles it is difficult to give any rule; but he shall seldom err who remembers, that when a verb has a participle distinct from its preterite, as write, wrote, written, that distinct participle is more proper and elegant, as The book is written, is better than The book is wrote. Wrote however may be used in poetry; at least, if we allow any authority to poets, who, in the exultation of genius, think themselves perhaps entitled to trample on grammarians.

There are other anomalies in the preterite.

1. Win, spin, begin, swim, strike, stick, sing, sting, fling, ring, wring, spring, swing, drink, sink, shrink, stink, come, run, find, bind, grind, wind, both in the preterite imperfect and participle passive, give won, spun, begun, swum, struck, stuck, sung, stung, flung, rung, wrung, sprung, swung, drunk, sunk, shrunk, stunk, come, run, found, bound, ground, wound. And most of them are also formed in the preterite by a, as began, rang, sang, sprang, drank, came, ran, and some others; but most of these are now obsolete. Some in the participle passive likewise take en, as stricken, strucken, drunken, bounden.

2. Fight, teach, reach, seek, beseech, catch, buy, bring, think, work, make fought, taught, raught, sought, besought, caught, bought, brought, thought, wrought.

But a great many of these retain likewise the regular form, as teached, reached, beseeched, catched, worked.

3. Take, shake, forsake, wake, awake, stand, break, speak, bear, shear, swear, tear, weave, cleave, strive, thrive, drive, shine, rise, arise, smite, write, bide, abide, ride, choose, chuse, tread, get, beget, forget, seethe, make in both preterite and participle, took, forsook, woke, awoke, stood, broke, spoke, bore, shore, swore, tore, wore, wove, clove,

strove, throve, drove, shone, rose, arose, smote, wrote, bode, abode, rode, chose, trode, got, begot, forgot, sod. But we say likewise, thrive, rise, smit, writ, abid, rid. In the preterite some are likewise formed by a, as brake, spake, bare, share, sware, tare, ware, clave, gat, begat, forgat, and perhaps some others, but more rarely. In the participle passive are many of them formed by en, as taken, shaken, forsaken, broken, spoken, born, shorn, sworn, torn, worn, woven, cloven, thriven, driven, risen, smitten, ridden, chosen, trodden, gotten, begotten, forgotten, sodden. And many do likewise retain the analogy in both, as waked, awaked, sheared, weaved, leaved, abided, seethed.

4. Give, bid, sit, make in the preterite, gave, bade, sate; in the participle passive, given, bidden, sitten; but in both bid.

5. Draw, know, grow, throw, blow, crow like a cock, fly, slay, see, ly, make their preterite drew, knew, grew, threw, blew, crew, flew, slew, saw, lay; their participles passive by n, drawn, known, grown, thrown, blown, flown, slain, seen, lien, lain. Yet from flee, is made fled; from go, went, from the old wend, but the participle is gone.

Of Derivation.

That the English language may be more easily understood, it is necessary to enquire how its derivative words are deduced from their primitives, and how the primitives are borrowed from other languages. In this enquiry I shall sometimes copy Dr. Wallis, and sometimes endeavour to supply his defects, and rectify his errours.

(d) Nouns are derived from verbs.

The thing implied in the verb as done or produced, is commonly either the present of the verb; as, to love, love; to fright, a fright; to fight, a fight; or

(d) [Nouns are derived from verbs. Such is the unqualified assertion of Dr. Johnson. M. Court de Gebelin, on the other hand, deduces all words from nouns. "Il a fallu nécessairement, que tous les autres mots vinssent de noms. Il n'est aucun mot, de quelqu' espèce que ce soit, et dans quelque langue que ce soit, qui ne descende d'un nom." Hist. de Parole, p. 180. And thus one of our ingenious countrymen has asserted, that "the verbs are not of themselves the primitive words of our language. They are all in a state of composition. They are like the secondary mountains of the earth; they have been formed posterior to the ancient bulwarks of human speech, which are the nouns: I mean of course those nouns which are in their elementary state." Turner, Hist. of the Anglo-Sax. vol. iv. B. 8. ch. 1. But the question, which were prior, nouns or verbs, has obtained an examination more minute than what is contained in these assertions. "It is obvious to suppose," bishop Burgess has observed, "that the things which were nearest, and most necessary to man, were first denominated. And it may therefore seem, that the names of things were prior to verbs. But there is another question, which as necessarily obtrudes itself: Why were these things thus denominated? It seems natural to suppose, that they were denominated from their actions, uses, appearances, &c. And thus of animals, which it is probable were named as early as any of the objects, with which he was familiar, some might have been from their rapacity; some from their swiftness, &c. But in expressing the actions of things, the use of the verb, which is the symbol of action, is necessarily implied. So that the verbs, which were used to express every kind of action, must have been prior to the names of things, which were denominated from their actions. Not that all verbs were prior to all nouns, or that a particular class of verbs was prior to a particular class of nouns, but that every individual noun, which expressed the name of a thing from its action, was derived from a verb expressive of that action, which was ultimately referable to one general idea, which is the principle of every action." Ess. on the Study of Antiq. 2d edit. p. 89. "One of the objects of lord Monboddo," he adds, "has been to shew, through the evidence afforded by language, that all ideas communicated by words, not denoting particular sounds, and certain external adjuncts, or personal relation, were originally made known through the means of one general idea, which is the principle of every action, and which by the multiplex variety of its combinations is suited to the expressing of every action; that all verbs, not imitative of sounds, &c. are resolvable to that general idea; that the names of things are derived from verbs, and therefore return to the same universal origin."

In the earliest state of man, his language, it is probable, was simple; and has been considered, in great measure, monosyllabick, without composition and inflection. That it was derived from natural and external objects, by the exercise of the capacity which God gave to man to form a judgement of the things perceived by him, may well be supposed. And to the nouns of this rude period the observation of Mr. Turner must apply with indisputable force. The remark of Wachter on the derivation of words from natural objects, particularly deserves notice.

"Operæ pretium est ostendere, quanta sit vis naturæ in fingendis vocabulis. Primo, quædam voces ita sunt comparatæ, ut non solum idearum nostrarum, sed etiam rerum ipsarum sint imagines, et proinde ab ipsâ naturâ videantur ori hominum sponte ingestæ. Sic quando volumus significare id quod supra nos est, tunc aërem haustum in altum protrudimus, manifestâ vocis cum ipsâ re convenientiâ. Nam altus Gothis dicitur hauh, Anglo-sax. heah, Alam. et Francis hoh, Cambris uch, Anglis high, Belg. hoog, nobis hoch. Ad hanc classem spectant, heben levare in altum, haubt caput, pars hominis excelsa, et ad sublimia inspicienda facta, hübel, hugel collis, hauffe cumulus, hæffe fæx, &c. In aliis vocibus aliæ exprimuntur naturæ qualitates. Sic clarum et perspicuum vocamus bar, obscurum dunkel, manifestâ signi cum re signatâ similitudine, quoniam claritas et obscuritas in ipsis vocibus jam continentur. Et sic in aliis nominibus alia insunt secreta, nec inventu difficilia, nec scitu injucunda." Gloss. Germ. Præf. § v.

Let us now attend to what Mr. Horne Tooke says in his introduction to the ancient theory, that language is originally composed only of nouns and verbs, and that these are the only necessary parts of speech, the rest, so named, being merely the abbreviations of these. I call it the ancient theory; which, it will be seen, in the strictest sense it is; and as it has been illustrated by modern diligence, let me not be considered as detracting from the improvement added to it by Mr. Tooke, in stating that the revival of it originated with etymologists anterior to him, however some of his followers have blindly considered it as a perfect novelty, and however he has concealed his love of kindred investigation.

His position is this: "The business of the mind, as far as it concerns language, appears to me to be very simple. It extends no farther than to receive impressions, that is, to have sensations or feelings. What are called its operations, are merely the operations of language. A consideration of ideas, or of the mind, or of things, relative to the parts of speech, will lead us no farther than to nouns; i. e. the signs of those impressions, or names of ideas. The other part of speech, the verb, must be accounted for from the necessary use of it in communication. It is, in fact, the communication itself; and therefore well denominated ῥημα, dictum. For the verb is quod loquimur; the noun, de quo." Div. of Purley, vol. i. p. 51. This may seem to support the general assertion, that nouns are derived from verbs. On the other hand, it has been remarked, that verbs are frequently no other than nouns with a final syllable added, and sometimes without any alteration of form; such as love, hope, fear, of the latter kind, in English; and of the former, in Saxon, capian to care, to be anxious, from cap, care, cyðan, to make known, from cyð, knowledge, &c. Turner, Hist. Anglo-Sax. vol. i. B. 8. ch. 1. Mr. Turner indeed asserts, that if we go through all the alphabet, we shall find that most of the Saxon verbs are composed of a noun, and the syllables an, ian, or gan. This final syllable, he premises, is a word expressive of motion, or action, or possession. Yet, in the list of verbs thus derived by Mr. Turner, there are some which may be conceived to disclaim this origin, and to have been themselves the parents, not the offspring, of nouns. Is not the noun bad, a pledge, that is, the thing given or pledged, rather from the verb badian, to pledge, than the verb from the noun? And bæp, a bier, is much more likely to be derived from bæpan, to carry, than that the latter should originate from the former. The noun is here denominated from its use, that which bears or carries, or that which is borne, and therefore arose out of the verb which expresses this kind of action. The Greeks and Latins thus formed the similar nouns φερετρον, and feretrum, from the verbs φερω, and fero. Again, behod, a command, can be no other than the past participle of behodan, to command. So big, a crown, from bigan, to bend, where the appearance of the thing points to the verb as supplying the substantive. So if byle be an habitation, and dæl, a part, the former will be considered that which is built, from byan, to build, and the latter, that which is divided or parted, from dælan, to divide.

However, that all language is reducible to nouns and verbs, is the doctrine of Plato; and is eloquently maintained in the Platonicæ Quæstiones of Plutarch. Of the same opinion was Aristotle: "Aristoteles duas partes orationis esse dicit, vocabula et verba." Varro de Ling. Lat. Hence the observation of Priscian: "Quibusdam philosophis placuit nomen et verbum solas esse partes orationis; cætera vero, adminicula vel juncturas earum." Lib. xi. To this opinion, in later times, Vossius, professor Schultens, Lennep, and others, have expressed their assent; but none so much in accordance with Mr. Tooke, as Hoogeven in his dissertation on the Greek particles. That particles are, as Mr. Tooke pronounces them, abbreviations of other words, is, however, neither the discovery of Hoogeven who preceded him, nor of Mr. Tooke himself. The fact is illustrated the preterite of the verb; as, to strike, I strick or strook, a stroke.

The action is the same with the participle present, as, loving, frighting, fighting, striking.

The agent, or person acting, is denoted by the syllable er added to the verb, as lover, frighter, striker.

Substantives, adjectives, and sometimes other parts of speech, are changed into verbs: in which case the vowel is often lengthened, or the consonant softened; as, a house, to house; brass, to braze; glass, to glaze; grass, to graze; price, to prize; breath, to breathe; a fish, to fish; oil, to oil; further, to further; forward, to forward; hinder, to hinder.

Sometimes the termination en is added, especially to adjectives; as, haste, to hasten; length, to lengthen; strength, to strengthen; short, to shorten; fast, to fasten; white, to whiten; black, to blacken; hard, to harden; soft, to soften.

From substantives are formed adjectives of plenty, by adding the termination y; as, a louse, lousy; wealth, wealthy; health, healthy; might, mighty; worth, worthy; wit, witty; lust, lusty; water, watery; earth, earthy; wood, a wood, woody; air, airy; a heart, hearty; a hand, handy.

From substantives are formed adjectives of plenty, by adding the termination ful, denoting abundance; as, joy, joyful; fruit, fruitful; youth, youthful; care, careful; use, useful; delight, delightful; plenty, plentiful; help, helpful.

Sometimes, in almost the same sense, but with some kind of diminution thereof, the termination some is added, denoting something, or in some degree; as, delight, delightsome; game, gamesome; irk, irksome; burden, burdensome; trouble, troublesome; light, lightsome; hand, handsome; alone, lonesome; toil, toilsome.

On the contrary, the termination less added to substantives, makes adjectives signifying want; as, worthless, witless, heartless, joyless, careless, helpless. Thus comfort, comfortless; sap, sapless.

Privation or contrariety is very often denoted by the particle un prefixed to many adjectives, or in before words derived from the Latin; as, pleasant, unpleasant; wise, unwise; profitable, unprofitable; patient, impatient. Thus, unworthy, unhealthy, unfruitful, unuseful, and many more.

in the work of a learned German on the subject of the Hebrew particles, published in 1734.

"Particulæ separatæ, si non omnes, certè pleræque suâ naturâ sunt nomina. Hanc thesin, licet hactenus novam et inauditam, verissimam tamen esse, præsentes tibi persuadere poterunt pagellæ. His enim cum curiâ perlectis, facilè intelliges omnes omnino Ebræorum particulas separatas aut nomina esse aut verba." Christ. Koerber, Lex. Partic. Hebr. This etymological principle is thus displayed by Hoogeven: "Primam, ut reliquarum, ita Græcæ quoque linguæ originem fuisse simplicissimam, ipsa natura ac ratio docent, primosque ὀνομαθέρας nomina, quibus res, et verba quibus actiones exprimerent, non verò particulas instituisse, probabile est. Certè, cùm ex nominibus et verbis integra constet oratio, quorum hæc actiones et affectiones, illa personas agentes et patientes indicant; jure quæritur, an primæva lingua habuerit particulas.—Reverà ipsæ particulæ olim fuerunt vel nomina, vel verba; ut clarè patebit, ubi de singularum particularum originibus dicam." Doctr. Particularum Ling. Gr. 1769. Præf.

The claim to originality, therefore, belongs not to Mr. Tooke. Nor in the application of the doctrine is he without predecessor or guide. Yet let us first attend to what a recent critick affirms: "Neither Skinner, nor Junius, nor Johnson, nor indeed any other English grammarian, or lexicographer, had any idea that the past participle in our own language was an abundant source of general terms; the discovery was Tooke's; and it becomes necessary to remark that we shall find Junius and Skinner in many instances (particularly Skinner) referring to the same Anglo-Saxon or old English verb, which Tooke has also fixed upon as the parent of some English noun; but the difference is this: Skinner refers generally to the verb, not unfrequently with a mere mallem deflecti, and knows neither in what manner, nor from what part, of the verb, such noun is immediately obtained: Tooke establishes the past participle to be the part of the verb, and explains the general manner of the adoption." Illustr. of English Philology by Charles Richardson, Esq. 1815. p. 40. Mr. Tooke certainly performs what is here stated. But who preceded him in this way of illustration? Mr. Richardson could not, or would not inform the reader. I will therefore inform him that Wachter, so long since as in 1787, and in a work well known, indeed most worthy to be known by all scholars, particularly discussed the method of deducing substantives from verbs and participles, which, it will be seen, was also an ancient practice:

"D. [est] Medium formandi substantiva à verbis, aliisque partibus orationis. Ita brand, incendium, derivatur à brennen, ardere; schuld, debitum, à sollen, debere; hemd, indusium, ab heimen, tegere; gelübd, votum, à loben, promittere; gemæld, pictura, à malen, pingere; fed, inimicitia, à fien, odisse; gegend, plaga, loca opposita, à gegen, contra. Et sic alia ab aliis. Confer exempla in De. In reliquis, quæ huc referri non possunt, d est litera participialis, et nota originis ex participio. Solent enim prisci ex participiis formare substantiva, et terminationem participialem derivatis relinquere, tanquam custodem originis. Hæc una litera nos quasi manu ducit ad permulta vocabulorum secreta intelligenda, quæ certè suam significandi vim non aliunde habent quàm à PRÆSENTIS TEMPORIS PARTICIPIO, à quo oriuntur. Hujusmodi sunt, abend, vespera ab aben, deficere; heiland, servator, ab heilen, servare; freund, amicus, à freyen, amare; feind, inimicus, à fien, odisse; wind, ventus, à wehen, flare; mond, luna, à manen, monere." Gloss. Germ. Prolegom. § vi.

And have we none amongst our own countrymen, besides Mr. Tooke, to whom something like this mode of deduction was known? Have not Skinner and Ray preceded him in his admired derivation of if? Is not the former, in his glossarial illustration of but and unless, acting directly upon this etymological principle? Are the labours of Junius and Lye never directed to similar purposes? Brian Twyne also, an eminent Saxon scholar, who flourished nearly two centuries since, and who, like Mr. Tooke, has derived shire from ꝛcýpan, seems to have understood this principle. See his Saxon Alphabet, MSS. Corp. Chr. Coll. Ox. N°. 1780. Let us proceed to another of Mr. Tooke's celebrated derivations; the head, from the past participle heaved; and he will again want the merit, not of adaptation, but of originality. The Gothick "haubith is the head; from haufjan, tollere, levare; the head being the most erect and elevated part of the body. Upon the same principle, the Sax. heafod, from heavan, and the English head, from the participle heaved, of the same signification, are made: a derivation more rational than either the Greek κεφαλη, or the Latin caput, can boast of." Rev. Mr. Drake on the Orig. of the Eng. Lang. Archæol. vol. v. p. 380.

While all must readily and gratefully admit, that Mr. Tooke has much enlarged and improved this method of illustration; none perhaps will now deny, that his theory is not a novelty even to Englishmen. An acute writer, speaking of Fortescue's Treatise on the difference between an Absolute and Limited Monarchy, (which was published in 1714, not in 1724, as Mr. White states it,) has lately remarked, that into the pages of another of his countrymen on the subject of Saxon literature Mr. Tooke had looked silently but not in vain. This book was "not unknown to the late Mr. Horne Tooke, as is evident by some of the Saxon etymologies in his Diversions of Purley, borrowed from the first lord Fortescue's glossarial annotations on this work of his venerable ancestor." A Review of Johnson's Criticism on the Style of Milton's English Prose, &c. By T. Holt White, Esq. 1818. p. 19. It is indeed the object of the noble annotator, and it is excellently accomplished, to point out to the English reader "the great affinity between our language and the Saxon, and to be thereby put in a way to trace the original of the English tongue. — This language will help him to multitudes of etymologies." Pref. pp. xli. xlii.

It has been said, "that one great and obvious defect of Mr. Tooke's ingenious system, viewed in a general light, is, that it proceeds on the supposition that the Anglo-Saxon is a language completely insulated; or at least, that, whatever intimacy of connexion it has with the cognate tongues in other respects, it has none with regard to the formation of its particles." Dr. Jamieson, Scott. Dict. in V. Sen. But though this defect attends it, though the author is not without obligation to the labours of others, though the work consists principally of details, and some mistakes in them might be exposed where truth and modesty alike are slighted; great ingenuity of hypothesis, together with successful illustrations of our ancient literature, is abundantly found in the Diversions of Purley; and the clearest light has hence been thrown upon the theory of language. Fairer would have been the fame of Mr. Tooke, if he had not intermixed with the elegances of philology what will never endear his name as a moralist or a politician.]

The original English privative is un; but as we often borrow from the Latin, or its descendants, words already signifying privation, as inefficacious, impious, indiscreet, the inseparable particles un and in have fallen into confusion, from which it is not easy to disentangle them.

Un is prefixed to all words originally English, as untrue, untruth, untaught, unhandsome.

Un is prefixed to all participles made privative adjectives, as unfeeling, unassisting, unaided, undelighted, unendeared.

Un ought never to be prefixed to a participle present, to mark a forbearance of action, as unsighing; but a privation of habit, as unpitying.

Un is prefixed to most substantives which have an English termination, as unfertileness, unperfectness, which, if they have borrowed terminations, take in or im, as infertility, imperfection; uncivil, incivility; unactive, inactivity.

In borrowing adjectives, if we receive them already compounded, it is usual to retain the particle prefixed, as, indecent, inelegant, improper; but if we borrow the adjective, and add the privative particle, we commonly prefix un, as, unpolite, ungallant.

The prepositive particles dis and mis, derived from the des and mes of the French, signify almost the same as un; yet dis rather imports contrariety than privation, since it answers to the Latin preposition de. Mis insinuates some error, and for the most part may be rendered by the Latin words male or perperam. To like, to dislike; honour, dishonour; to honour, to grace, to dishonour, to disgrace; to deign, to disdeign; chance, hap, mischance, mishap; to take, to mistake; deed, misdeed; to use, to misuse; to employ, to misemploy; to apply, to misapply.

Words derived from Latin written with de or dis retain the same signification, as, distinguish, distinguo; detract, detraho; defame, defamo; detain, detineo.

The termination ly added to substantives, and sometimes to adjectives, forms adjectives that import some kind of similitude or agreement, being formed by contraction of lich or like.

A giant, giantly, giantlike; earth, earthly; heaven, heavenly; world, worldly; God, godly; good, goodly.

The same termination ly, added to adjectives, forms (e) adverbs of like signification; as, beautiful, beautifully; sweet, sweetly; that is, in a beautiful manner; with some degree of sweetness.

The termination ish added to adjectives, imports diminution; and added to substantives, imports similitude or tendency to a character; as, green, greenish; white, whitish; soft, softish; a thief, thievish; a wolf, wolvish; a child, childish.

We have forms of diminutives in substantives, though not frequent; as a hill, a hillock; a cock, a cockrel; a pike, pickrel; this is a French termination: a goose, a gosling; this is a German termination: a lamb, a lambkin; a chick, a chicken; a man, a manikin; a pipe, a pipkin; and thus Halkin, whence the patronymick Hawkins; Wilkin, Thomkin, and others.

Yet still there is another form of diminution among the English, by lessening the sound itself, especially of vowels; as there is a form of augmenting them by enlarging, or even lengthening it; and that sometimes not so much by change of the letters, as of their pronunciation; as sup, sip, soop, sop, sippet, where, besides the extenuation of the vowel, there is added the French termination et; top, tip; spit, spout; babe, baby, booby, βᾶπαις; great pronounced long, especially if with a stronger sound, grea-t; little, pronounced long, lee-tle; ting, tang, tong, imports a succession of smaller and then greater sounds; and so in jingle, jangle, tingle, tangle, and many other made words.

Much however of this is arbitrary and fanciful, depending wholly on oral utterance, and therefore scarcely worthy the notice of Wallis.

Of concrete adjectives are made abstract substantives, by adding the termination ness, and a few in hood or head, noting character or qualities; as, white, whiteness; hard, hardness; great, greatness; skilful, skilfulness, unskilfulness; godhead, manhood, maidenhead, widowhood, knighthood, priesthood, likelihood, falsehood.

There are other abstracts, partly derived from adjectives, and partly from verbs, which are formed by the addition of the termination th, a small change being sometimes made; as long, length; strong, strength; broad, breadth; wide, width; deep, depth; true, truth; warm, warmth; dear, dearth; slow, slowth; merry, mirth; heal, health; well, weal, wealth; dry, droughth; young, youth; and so moon, month.

Like these are some words derived from verbs; dy, death; till, tilth; grow, growth; mow, later mowth; after mow'th; commonly spoken and written later math, after math; steal, stealth; bear, birth; rue, ruth; and probably earth from to ear or plow; fly, flight; weigh, weight; fray, fright; to draw, draught.

These should rather be written flighth, frighth, only that custom will not suffer h to be twice repeated.

The same form retain, faith, spight, wreathe, wrath, broth, froth, breath, sooth, worth, light, wight, and the like, whose primitives are either entirely obsolete, or seldom occur. Perhaps they are derived from fey or foy, spry, wry, wreak, brew, mow, fry, bray, say, work.

Some ending in ship imply an office, employment, or condition; as, kingship, wardship, guardianship; partnership, stewardship, headship, lordship.

(e) [This is the only notice, which Dr. Johnson has taken of ADVERBS. In the same way he overpasses CONJUNCTIONS and PREPOSITIONS. These indeed are almost wholly abbreviations, or particles, which originally belonged to a different class of words. See the preceding note.

The ADVERB, as it is called, is eminently useful, in compendiously expressing, in one word, what would otherwise require two or more; and joined to verbs, participles, and adjectives, denotes quality or circumstance: as affirmation in certainly, yes; negation in no, not; doubt in perhaps; interrogation in how; time present in now; past in lately; future in hereafter; uncertain or indefinite in when; place in here, hither, within; order in secondly, thirdly. Quality or manner is abundantly expressed by adverbs formed from adjectives and participles, as Dr. Johnson has observed, with the termination ly; as, ably, contentedly, learnedly.

The CONJUNCTION connects either sentences or words; and is called copulative, when it expresses addition, a cause, supposition, or condition; as, and, both, but, because, for, if, that: disjunctive, when it continues the connexion, but expresses opposition of meaning in various degrees; as, although, though, but, or, nor, either, neither, than, unless, &c.

The PREPOSITION is so called, because it is placed before a substantive, and connects it with other words: as, above, about, before, behind, in, into, &c. Most of our prepositions originally denoted the relation of place; but are now applied to various relations. One great use of them in our language, Dr. Lowth observes, is to express those relations which in some languages are chiefly marked by cases, or the different endings of the noun.

The INTERJECTION yet remains to be noticed, which is the expression of different affections and passions; of surprise in ah; of grief in alas, ah, and oh; of exultation and triumph in aha, huzza; of admiration and calling attention in lo and behold, &c. They are thrown in between the parts of a sentence, and sometimes commence it. The interjection O, prefixed to nouns, expresses more forcibly the address made to any person or thing; and answers to the vocative case of the Latins: prefixed to verbs, it sometimes denotes exhortation, and sometimes solicits pity.

Of these parts of speech we may say lastly with the admired author of the Principles of French Grammar, "En quoi les adverbes, les prépositions, et les conjonctions, sont elles différentes des autres parties du discours? En ce qu'elles sont indéclinables, et qu'elles ne sont susceptibles d'aucun changement. Ainsi on ne peut ni les decliner comme les noms, ni les conjuguer comme les verbes."]

Thus worship, that is, worthship; whence worshipful, and to worship.

Some few ending in dom, rick, wick, do especially denote dominion, at least state or condition; as, kingdom, dukedom, earldom, princedom, popedom, christendom, freedom, wisdom, whoredom, bishoprick, bailywick.

Ment and age are plainly French terminations, and are of the same import with us as among them, scarcely ever occurring, except in words derived from the French, as commandment, usage.

There are in English often long trains of words allied by their meaning and derivation; as, to beat, a bat, batoon, a battle, a beetle, a battle-door, to batter, batter, a kind of glutinous composition for food, made by beating different bodies into one mass. All these are of similar signification, and perhaps derived from the Latin batuo. Thus take, touch, tickle, tack, tackle; all imply a local conjunction, from the Latin tango, tetigi, tactum.

From two are formed twain, twice, twenty, twelve, twins, twine, twist, twirl, twig, twitch, twinge, between, betwixt, twilight, twibil.

The following remarks, extracted from Wallis, are ingenious, but of more subtlety than solidity, and such as perhaps might in every language be enlarged without end.

Sn usually imply the nose, and what relates to it. From the Latin nasus are derived the French nez and the English nose; and nesse, a promontory, as projecting like a nose. But as if from the consonants ns taken from nasus, and transposed, that they may the better correspond, sn denote nasus; and thence are derived many words that relate to the nose, as snout, sneeze, snore, snort, sneer, snicker, snot, snevil, snite, snuff, snuffle, snaffle, snarle, snudge.

There is another sn, which may perhaps be derived from the Latin sinuo, as, snake, sneak, snail, snare; so likewise snap and snatch, snib, snub.

Bl imply a blast; as, blow, blast, to blast, to blight, and metaphorically to blast one's reputation; bleat, bleak, a bleak place, to look bleak or weather-beaten, bleak, blay, bleach, bluster, blurt, blister, blab, bladder, bleb, blabber-lip't, blubber-cheek't, bloted, blote-herrings, blast, blaze, to blow, that is, blossom, bloom; and perhaps blood and blush.

In the native words of our tongue is to be found a great agreement between the letters and the thing signified; and therefore the sounds of letters smaller, sharper, louder, closer, softer, stronger, clearer, more obscure, and more stridulous, do very often intimate the like effects in the things signified.

Thus words that begin with str intimate the force and effect of the thing signified, as if probably derived from στρώννυμι, or strenuus; as, strong, strength, strew, strike, streake, stroke, stripe, strive, strife, strout, strut, stretch, strait, strict, streight, that is, narrow, distrain, stress, distress, string, strap, stream, streamer, strand, strip, stray, struggle, strange, stride, straddle.

St in like manner imply strength, but in a less degree, so much only as is sufficient to preserve what has been already communicated, rather than acquire any new degree; as if it were derived from the Latin sto: for example, stand, stay, that is, to remain, or to prop; staff, stay, that is, to oppose, stop, to stuff, stifle, to stay, that is, to stop; a stay, that is, an obstacle; stick, stut, stutter, stammer, stagger, stickle, stick, stake, a sharp pale, and any thing deposited at play; stock, stem, sting, to sting, stink, stitch, stud, stanchion, stub, stubble, to stub up, stump, whence stumble, stalk, to stalk, step, to stamp with the feet, whence to stamp, that is, to make an impression and a stamp; stow, to stow, to bestow, steward or stoward, stead, steady, steadfast, stable, a stable, a stall, to stall, stool, stall, still, stall, stallage, stall, stage, still adj. and still adv. stale, stout, sturdy, steed, stoat, stallion, stiff, stark-dead, to starve with hunger or cold; stone, steel, stern, stanch, to stanch blood, to stare, steep, steeple, stair, standard, a stated measure, stately. In all these, and perhaps some others, st denote something firm and fixed.

Thr imply a more violent degree of motion, as, throw, thrust, throng, throb, through, threat, threaten, thrall, throws.

Wr imply some sort of obliquity or distortion, as, wry, to wreathe, wrest, wrestle, wring, wrong, wrinch, wrench, wrangle, wrinkle, wrath, wreak, wrack, wretch, wrist, wrap.

Sw imply a silent agitation, or a softer kind of lateral motion; as, sway, swag, to sway, swagger, swerve, sweat, sweep, swill, swim, swing, swift, sweet, switch, swinge.

Nor is there much difference of sm, in smooth, smug, smile, smirk, smite, which signifies the same as to strike, but is a softer word; small, smell, smack, smother, smart, a smart blow properly signifies such a kind of stroke as with an originally silent motion implied in sm, proceeds to a quick violence, denoted by ar suddenly ended, as is shewn by t.

Cl denote a kind of adhesion or tenacity, as in cleave, clay, cling, climb, clamber, clammy, clasp, to clasp, to clip, to clinch, cloak, clog, close, to close, a clod, a clot, as a clot of blood, clouted cream, a clutter, a cluster.

Sp imply a kind of dissipation or expansion, especially a quick one, particularly if there be an r, as if it were from spargo or separo: for example, spread, spring, sprig, sprout, sprinkle, split, splinter, spill, spit, sputter, spatter.

Sl denote a kind of silent fall, or a less observable motion; as, in slime, slide, slip, slipper, sly, sleight, slit, slow, slack, slight, sling, slap.

And so likewise, ash, in crash, rash, gash, flash, clash, lash, slash, plash, trash, indicate something acting more nimbly and sharply. But ush, in crush, rush, gush, flush, blush, brush, hush, push, implies something as acting more obtusely and dully. Yet in both there is indicated a swift and sudden motion, not instantaneous, but gradual, by the continued sound sh.

Thus in fling, sling, ding, swing, cling, sing, wring, sting, the tingling of the termination ng, and the sharpness of the vowel i, imply the continuation of a very slender motion or tremor, at length indeed vanishing, but not suddenly interrupted. But in tink, wink, sink, clink, chink, think, that end in a mute consonant, there is also indicated a sudden ending.

If there be an l, as in jingle, tingle, tinkle, mingle, sprinkle, twinkle, there is implied a frequency, or iteration of small acts. And the same frequency of acts, but less subtile by reason of the clearer vowel a, is indicated in jangle, tangle, spangle, mangle, wrangle, brangle, dangle; as also in mumble, grumble, jumble, tumble, stumble, rumble, crumble, fumble. But at the same time the close u implies something obscure or obtunded; and a congeries of consonants, mbl, denotes a confused kind of rolling or tumbling, as in ramble, scamble, scramble, wamble, amble; but in these there is something acute.

In nimble, the acuteness of the vowel denotes celerity. In sparkle, sp denotes dissipation, ar an acute crackling, k a sudden interruption, l a frequent iteration; and in like manner in sprinkle, unless in may imply the subtilty of the dissipated guttules. Thick and thin differ, in that the former ends with an obtuse consonant, and the latter with an acute.

In like manner, in squeek, squeak, squeal, squall, braul, wraul, yaul, spaul, screek, shriek, shrill, sharp, shrivel, wrinkle, crack, crash, clash, gnash, plash, crush, hush, hisse, fisse, whist, soft, jarr, hurl, curl, whirl, buz, bustle, spindle, dwindle, twine, twist, and in many more, we may observe the agreement of such sort of sounds with the things signified: and this so frequently happens, that scarce any language which I know can be compared with ours. So that one monosyllable word, of which kind are almost all ours, emphatically expresses what in other languages can scarce be explained but by compounds, or decompounds, or sometimes a tedious circumlocution.

We have many words borrowed from the Latin; but the greatest part of them were communicated by the intervention of the French; as, grace, face, elegant, elegance, resemble.

Some verbs, which seem borrowed from the Latin, are formed from the present tense, and some from the supines.

From the present are formed spend, expend, expendo; conduce, conduco; despise, despicio; approve, approbo; conceive, concipio.

From the supines, supplicate, supplico; demonstrate, demonstro; dispose, dispono; expatiate, expatior; suppress, supprimo; exempt, eximo.

Nothing is more apparent, than that Wallis goes too far in quest of originals. Many of these which seem selected as immediate descendants from the Latin, are apparently French, as, conceive, approve, expose, exempt.

Some words purely French, not derived from the Latin, we have transferred into our language; as, garden, garter, buckler, to advance, to cry, to plead, from the French jardin, jartier, bouclier, avancer, cryer, plaider; though indeed, even of these, part is of Latin original.

As to many words which we have in common with the Germans, it is doubtful whether the old Teutons borrowed them from the Latins, or the Latins from the Teutons, or both had them from some common original; as, wine, vinum; wind, ventus; went, veni; way, via; wall, vallum; wallow, volvo; wool, vellus; will, volo; worm, vermis; worth, virtus; wasp, vespa; day, dies; draw, traho; tame, domo, δαμάω; yoke, jugum, ζεῦγος; over, upper, super, ὑπὲρ; am, sum, εἰμί; break, frango; fly, volo; blow, flo. I make no doubt but the Teutonick is more ancient than the Latin: and it is no less certain, that the Latin, which borrowed a great number of words, not only from the Greek, especially the Æolick, but from other neighbouring languages, as the Oscan and others, which have long become obsolete, received not a few from the Teutonick. It is certain, that the English, German, and other Teutonick languages, retained some derived from the Greek, which the Latin has not; as ax, achs, mit, ford, pfurd, daughter, tochter, mickle, mingle, moon, sear, grave, graff, to grave, to scrape, whole, from ἀξίνη, μεῖδα, σορθμος, θυγαΐηρ, μεγάλος, μιγνύω, μῆνη, ξῆρος, γράφω, ὅλος. Since they received these immediately from the Greeks, without the intervention of the Latin language, why may not other words be derived immediately from the same fountain, though they be likewise found among the Latins?

Our ancestors were studious to form borrowed words, however long, into monosyllables; and not only cut off the formative terminations, but cropped the first syllable, especially in words beginning with a vowel; and rejected not only vowels in the middle, but likewise consonants of a weaker sound, retaining the stronger, which seem the bones of words, or changing them for others of the same organ, in order that the sound might become the softer; but especially transposing their order, that they might the more readily be pronounced without the intermediate vowels. For example, in expendo, spend; exemplum, sample; excipio, scape; extraneus, strange; extractum, stretch'd; excrucio, to screw; excorio, to scour; excortico, to scratch; and others beginning with ex: as also, emendo, to mend; episcopus, bishop; in Danish, bisp; epistola, pistle; hospitale, spittle; Hispania, Spain; historia, story.

Many of these etymologies are doubtful, and some evidently mistaken.

The following are somewhat harder, Alexander, Sander, Elisabetha, Betty; apis, bee; aper, bar; p passing into b, as in bishop; and by cutting off a from the beginning, which is restored in the middle: but for the old bar or bare, we now say boar; as for lang, long; for bain, bane; for stane, stone; aprugna, brawn, p being changed into b, and a transposed, as in aper, and g changed into w, as in pignus, pawn; lege, law; ἀλοπηξ, fox; cutting off the beginning, and changing p into f, as in pellis, a fell; pullus, a foal; pater, father; pavor, fear; polio, file; pleo, impleo, fill, full; piscis, fish; and transposing o into the middle, which was taken from the beginning; apex, a piece; peak, pike; zophorus, freese; mustum, stum; defensio, fence; dispensator, spencer; asculto, escouter, Fr. scout; exscalpo, scrape, restoring l instead of r, and hence scrap, scrable, scrawl; exculpo, scoop; exterritus, start; extonitus, attonitus, stonn'd; stomachus, maw; offendo, fined; obstipo, stop; audere, dare; cavere, ware, whence a-ware, be-ware, wary, warn, warning; for the Latin v consonant formerly sounded like our w, and the modern sound of the v consonant was formerly that of the letter f, that is, the Æolick digamma, which had the sound of φ, and the modern sound of the letter f was that of the Greek φ or ph; ulcus, ulcere, ulcer, sore, and hence sorry, sorrow, sorrowful; ingenium, engine, gin; scalenus, leaning, unless you would rather derive it from κλίνω, whence inclino; infundibulum, funnel; gagates, jett; projectum, to jett forth, a jetty; cucullus, a cowl.

There are syncopes somewhat harder; from tempore, time; from nomine, name; domina, dame; as the French homme, femme, nom, from homine, fœmina, nomine. Thus pagina, page; ποτήριον, pot; κυπελλα, cup, cantharus, can; tentorium, tent; precor, pray; præda, prey; specio, speculor, spy; plico, ply; implico, imply; replico, reply; complico, comply; sedes episcopalis, see.

A vowel is also cut off in the middle, that the number of the syllables may be lessened; as, amita, aunt; spiritus, spright; debitum, debt; dubito, doubt; comes, comitis, count; clericus, clerk; quietus, quit, quite; acquieto, to acquit; separo, to spare; stabilis, stable; stabulum, stable; pallacium, palace, place; rabula, rail, rawl, wraul, brawl, rable, brable; quæsitio, quest.

As also a consonant, or at least one of a softer sound, or even a whole syllable; rotundus, round; fragilis, frail; securus, sure; regula, rule; tegula, tile; subtilis, subtle; nomen, noun; decanus, dean; computo, count; subitaneus, suddain, soon; superare, to soar; periculum, peril; mirabile, marvel; as magnus, main; dignor, deign; tingo, stain; tinctum, taint; pingo, paint; prædari, reach.

The contractions may seem harder, where many of them meet, as, κυριακὸς, kyrk, church; presbyter, priest; sacristanus, sexton; frango, fregi, break, breach; fagus, φῆγα, beech, f changed into b, and g into ch, which are letters near akin; frigesco, freeze; frigesco, fresh, sc in sh, as above in bishop, fish, so in scapha, skiff, skip, and refrigesco, refresh; but viresco, fresh; phlebotomus, fleam; bovina, beef; vitulina, veal; scutifer, squire; pœnitentia, penance; sanctuarium, sanctuary, sentry; quæsitio, chase; perquisitio, purchase; anguilla, eel; insula, isle, ile, island, iland; insuletta, islet, ilet; eyght; and more contractedly ey, whence Owsney, Ruley, Ely; examinare, to sean, namely, by rejecting from the beginning and end e and o, according to the usual manner, the remainder xamin, which the Saxons, who did not use x, write csamen, or scamen is contracted into scan; as from dominus, don; nomine, noun; abomino, ban; and indeed apum examen they turned into sciame; for which we say swarme, by inserting r to denote the murmuring; thesaurus, store; sedile, stool; ὑετὸς, wet; sudo, sweat; gaudium, gay; jocus, joy; succus, juice; catena, chain; caliga, calga; chause, chausse, Fr. hose; extinguo, stanch, squench, quench, stint; foras, forth; species, spice; recito, read; adjuvo, aid; αἰὼν, ævum, ay, age, ever; floccus, lock; excerpo, scrape, scrabble, scrawl; extravagus, stray, straggle; collectum, clot, clutch; colligo, coil; recolligo, recoil; severo, swear; stridulus, shrill; procurator, proxy; pulso, to push; calamus, a quill; impetere, to impeach; augeo, auxi, wax; and vanesco, vanui, wane; syllabare, to spell; puteus, pit; granum, corn; comprimo, cramp, crump, crumple, crinkle.

Some may seem harsher, yet may not be rejected, for it at least appears, that some of them are derived from proper names, and there are others whose etymology is acknowledged by every body; as, Alexander, Elick, Scander, Sander, Sandy, Sanny; Elizabetha, Elizabeth, Elisabeth, Betty, Bess; Margareta, Margaret, Marget, Meg, Peg; Maria, Mary, Mal, Bal, Malkin, Mawkin, Mawkes; Matthæus, Mattha, Matthew; Martha, Matt, Pat; Gulielmus, Wilhelmus, Girolamo, Guillaume, William, Will, Bill, Wilkin, Wicken, Wicks, Weeks.

Thus cariophyllus, flos; gerofilo, Ital. giroflée, gilofer, Fr. gili-flower, which the vulgar call july-flower, as if derived from the month July; petroselinum, parsly; portulaca, purslain; cydonium, quince; cydoniatum, quiddeny; persicum, peach; eruca, cruke, which they corrupt to ear-wig, as if it took its name from the ear; annulus geminus, a gimmal, or gimbal ring; and thus the word gimbal and jumbal is transferred to other things thus interwoven; quelques choses, kickshaws. Since the origin of these, and many others, however forced, is evident, it ought to appear no wonder to any one if the ancients have thus disfigured many, especially as they so much affected monosyllables; and, to make them sound the softer, took this liberty of maiming, taking away, changing, transposing, and softening them.

But while we derive these from the Latin, I do not mean to say, that many of them did not immediately come to us from the Saxon, Danish, Dutch, and Teutonick languages, and other dialects, and some taken more lately from the French or Italians, or Spaniards.

The same word, according to its different significations, often has a different origin; as, to bear a burden, from fero; but to bear, whence birth, born, bairn, comes from pario, and a bear, at least if it be of Latin original, from fera. Thus perch, a fish, from perca; but perch, a measure, from pertica, and likewise to perch. To spell is from syllaba; but spell, an enchantment, by which it is believed that the boundaries are so fixed in lands, that none can pass them against the master's will, from expello; and spell, a messenger, from epistola; whence gospel, good-spel, or god-spell. Thus freese, or freeze, from frigesco; but freeze an architectonic word, from zophorus; but freese, for cloth, from Frisia, or perhaps from frigesco, as being more fit than any other for keeping out the cold.

There are many words among us, even monosyllables, compounded of two or more words, at least serving instead of compounds, and comprising the signification of more words than one; as from scrip and roll comes scroll; from proud and dance, prance; from st, of the verb stay or stand and out, is made stout; from stout and hardy, sturdy; from sp of spit or spew, and out, comes spout; from the same sp, with the termination in, is spin; and adding out, spin out; and from the same sp, with it, is spit, which only differs from spout in that it is smaller, and with less noise and force; but sputter is, because of the obscure u, something between spit and spout; and by reason of adding r, it intimates a frequent iteration and noise, but obscurely confused: whereas spatter, on account of the sharper and clearer vowel a, intimates a more distinct noise, in which it chiefly differs from sputter. From the same sp, and the termination ark, comes spark, signifying a single emission of fire with a noise; namely, sp the emission, ar the more acute noise, and k the mute consonant, intimates its being suddenly terminated; but adding l, is made the frequentative sparkle. The same sp, by adding r, that is spr, implies a more lively impetus of diffusing or expanding itself; to which adding the termination ing; it becomes spring; its vigour spr imports, its sharpness the termination ing; and lastly in acute and tremulous, ending in the mute consonant g, denotes the sudden ending of any motion, that it is meant in its primary signification, of a single, not a complicated exilition. Hence we call spring whatever has an elastick force; as also a fountain of water, and thence the origin of any thing; and to spring, to germinate; and spring, one of the four seasons. From the same spr and out, is formed sprout, and with the termination ig, sprig; of which the following, for the most part, is the difference; sprout, of a grosser sound, imports a fatter or grosser bud; spring, of a slenderer sound, denotes a smaller shoot. In like manner, from str of the verb strive, and out, comes strout and strut. From the same str, and the termination uggle, is made struggle; and this gl imports, but without any great noise, by reason of the obscure sound of the vowel u. In like manner, from throw and roll is made trull; and almost in the same sense is trundle, from throw or thrust, and rundle. Thus graff or grough is compounded of grave and rough; and trudge from tread or trot, and drudge.

In these observations it is easy to discover great sagacity and great extravagance, an ability to do much defeated by the desire of doing more than enough. It may be remarked,

1. That Wallis's derivations are often so made, that by the same licence any language may be deduced from any other.

2. That he makes no distinction between words immediately derived by us from the Latin, and those which, being copied from other languages, can therefore afford no example of the genius of the English language, or its laws of derivation.

3. That he derives from the Latin, often with great harshness and violence, words apparently Teutonick; and therefore, according to his own declaration, probably older than the tongue to which he refers them.

4. That some of his derivations are apparently erroneous.

SYNTAX.

The established practice of grammarians requires that I should here treat of the Syntax; but our language has so little inflection, or variety of terminations, that its construction neither requires nor admits many rules. Wallis therefore has totally neglected it; and Jonson, whose desire of following the writers upon the learned languages made him think a syntax indispensably necessary, has published such petty observations as were better omitted.

The verb, as in other languages, agrees with the nominative in number and person; as, Thou fliest from good; He runs to death.

Our adjectives and pronouns are invariable.

Of two substantives the noun possessive is the genitive; as, His father's glory; The sun's heat.

Verbs transitive require an oblique case; as, He loves me; You fear him.

All prepositions require an oblique case: He gave this to me; He took this from me; He says this of me; He came with me.

PROSODY.

It is common for those that deliver the grammar of modern languages, to omit their Prosody. So that of the Italians is neglected by Buomattei; that of the French by Desmarais; and that of the English by Wallis, Cooper, and even by Jonson, though a poet. But as the laws of metre are included in the idea of a grammar, I have thought it proper to insert them.

PROSODY comprises orthoepy, or the rules of pronunciation; and orthometry, or the laws of versification.

PRONUNCIATION is just, when every letter has its proper sound, and when every syllable has its proper accent, or which in English versification is the same, its proper quantity.

The sounds of the letters have been already explained; and rules for the accent or quantity are not easily to be given, being subject to innumerable exceptions. Such however as I have read or formed, I shall here propose.

1. Of dissyllables formed by affixing a termination, the former syllable is commonly accented, as, chíldish, kíngdom, áctest, ácted, tóilsome, lóver, scóffer, fáirer, fóremost, zéalous, fúlness, gódly, méekly, ártist.

2. Dissyllables formed by prefixing a syllable to the radical word, have commonly the accent on the latter; as, to begét, to beséem, to bestów.

3. Of dissyllables, which are at once nouns and verbs, the verb has commonly the accent on the latter, and the noun on the former syllable; as, to descánt, a déscant; to cemént, a cément; to contráct, a cóntract.

This rule has many exceptions. Though verbs seldom have their accent on the former, yet nouns often have it on the latter syllable; as, delight, perfúme.

4. All dissyllables ending in y, as cranny; in our, as lábour, fávour; in ow, as willow, wállow, except allów; in le, as báttle, bible; in ish, as bánish; in ck, as cámbrick, cássock; in ter, as to bátter; in age, as cóurage; in en, as fásten; in et, as quíet, accent the former syllable.

5. Dissyllable nouns in er, as cánker, bútter, have the accent on the former syllable.

6. Dissyllable verbs terminating in a consonant and e final, as compríse, escápe; or having a diphthong in the last syllable, as appéase, revéal; or ending in two consonants, as atténd, have the accent on the latter syllable.

7. Dissyllable nouns having a diphthong in the latter syllable, have commonly their accent on the latter syllable, as applaúse; except words in ain, cértain, moúntain.

8. Trissyllables formed by adding a termination, or prefixing a syllable, retain the accent of the radical word, as lóveliness, ténderness, contémner, wágoner, phýsical, bespátter, cómmenting, comménding, assúrance.

9. Trissyllables ending in ous, as grácious, árduous; in al, as cápital; in ion, as méntion, accent the first.

10. Trissyllables ending in ce, ent, and ate, accent the first syllable, as cóuntenance, cóntinence, ármament, imminent, élegant, própagate, except they be derived from words having the accent on the last, as connívance, acquáintance; or the middle syllable hath a vowel before two consonants, as promúlgate.

11. Trissyllables ending in y, as éntity, spécify, líberty, víctory, súbsidy, commonly accent the first syllable.

12. Trissyllables in re or le accent the first syllable, as légible, théatre, except discíple, and some words which have a position, as exámple, epístle.

13. Trissyllables in ude commonly accent the first syllable, as plénitude.

14. Trissyllables ending in ator or atour, as creátor, or having in the middle syllable a diphthong, as endeávour; or a vowel before two consonants, as doméstick, accent the middle syllable.

15. Trissyllables that have their accent on the last syllable are commonly French, as acquiésce, repartée, magazíne, or words formed by prefixing one or two syllables to an acute syllable, as immatúre, overchárge.

16. Polysyllables, or words of more than three syllables, follow the accent of the words from which they are derived, as árrogating, cóntinency, incóntinently, comméndable, communicableness. We should therefore say dispútable, indispútable, rather than dísputable, indísputable; and advértisement rather than advértisement.

17. Words in ion have the accent upon the antepenult, as, salvátion, perturbátion, concóction; words in atour or ator on the (f) penult, as dedicátor.

18. Words ending in le commonly have the accent on the first syllable, as ámicable, unless the second syllable have a vowel before two consonants, as combústible.

19. Words ending in ous have the accent on the antepenult, as uxórious, volúptuous.

20. Words ending in ty have their accent on the antepenult, as pusillanímity, activity.

These rules are not advanced as complete or infallible, but proposed as useful. Almost every rule of every language has its exceptions; and in English, as in other tongues, much must be learned by example and authority. Perhaps more and better rules may be given that have escaped my observation.

VERSIFICATION is the arrangement of a certain number of syllables according to certain laws.

The feet of our verses are either Iambick, as alóft, creáte; or Trochaick, as hóly, lófty.

Our Iambick measure comprises verses

Of four syllables,

" Most good, most fair,
Or things as rare,
To call you 's lost;
For all the cost
Words can bestow,
So poorly show
Upon your praise,
That all the ways
Sense hath come short." Drayton.

" With ravish'd ears
The monarch hears." Dryden.

Of six,

" Thus while we are abroad,
Shall we not touch our lyre?
Shall we not sing an ode?
Shall that holy fire,
In us that strongly glow'd,
In this cold air expire?

" Though in the utmost Peak
Awhile we do remain,
Amongst the mountains bleak,
Expos'd to sleet and rain,
No sport our hours shall break,
To exercise our vein.

" What though bright Phœbus' beams
Refresh the southern ground,
And though the princely Thames
With beauteous nymphs abound,
And by old Camber's streams
Be many wonders found.

" Yet many rivers clear
Here glide in silver swathes,
And what of all most dear,
Buxton's delicious baths,
Strong ale and noble chear,
T' asswage breem winter's scathes.

" In places far or near,
Or famous or obscure,
Where wholsom is the air,
Or where the most impure,
All times, and every where,
The muse is still in ure." Drayton.

Of eight, which is the usual measure for short Poems.

" And may at last my weary age
Find out the peaceful hermitage,
The hairy gown, and mossy cell,
Where I may sit, and nightly spell
Of ev'ry star the sky doth shew,
And ev'ry herb that sips the dew." Milton.

Of ten, which is the common measure of heroick and tragick poetry.

" Full in the midst of this created space,
Betwixt heav'n, earth, and skies, there stands a place

(f) [This is the Latin accent; and it is now more usual to say dédicator than dedicátor; and so in many other polysyllables, terminating in ator. Mediator, however, is mostly pronounced, and certainly with greater dignity, than on the first syllable, with the accent on the penult.]

Confining on all three; with triple bound;
Whence all things, though remote, are view'd around,
And thither bring their undulating sound.
The palace of loud Fame, her seat of pow'r,
Plac'd on the summit of a lofty tow'r;
A thousand winding entries long and wide
Receive of fresh reports a flowing tide.
A thousand crannies in the walls are made;
Nor gate nor bars exclude the busy trade.
'Tis built of brass, the better to diffuse
The spreading sounds, and multiply the news;
Where echoes in repeated echoes play:
A mart for ever full; and open night and day.
Nor silence is within, nor voice express,
But a deaf noise of sounds that never cease;
Confus'd and chiding, like the hollow roar
Of tides, receding from th' insulted shore;
Or like the broken thunder, heard from far,
When Jove to distance drives the rolling war.
The courts are fill'd with a tumultuous din
Of crowds, or issuing forth, or entering in:
A thorough-fare of news; where some devise
Things never heard, some mingle truth with lies:
The troubled air with empty sounds they beat,
Intent to hear, and eager to repeat." Dryden.

In all these measures the accents are to be placed on even syllables; and every line considered by itself is more harmonious, as this rule is more strictly observed. The variations necessary to pleasure belong to the art of poetry, not the rules of grammar.

Our Trochaick measures are

Of three syllables,

" Here we may
Think and pray,
Before death
Stops our breath:
Other joys
Are but toys." Walton's Angler.

Of five,

" In the days of old,
Stories plainly told,
Lovers felt annoy." Old Ballad.

Of (g) seven,

" Fairest piece of well-form'd earth,
Urge not thus your haughty birth." Waller.

In these measures the accent is to be placed on the odd syllables.

These are the measures which are now in use, and above the rest those of seven, eight, and ten syllables. Our ancient poets wrote verses sometimes of twelve syllables, as Drayton's Polyolbion.

" Of all the Cambrian shires their heads that bear so high,
And farth'st survey their soils with an ambitious eye,
Mervinia for her hills, as for their matchless crowds,
The nearest that are said to kiss the wand'ring clouds,
Especial audience craves, offended with the throng,
That she of all the rest neglected was so long;
Alleging for herself, when through the Saxon's pride,
The godlike race of Brute to Severn's setting side
Were cruelly inforc'd, her mountains did relieve
Those whom devouring war else every where did grieve.
And when all Wales beside (by fortune or by might)
Unto her ancient foe resign'd her ancient right,
A constant maiden still she only did remain,
The last her genuine laws which stoutly did retain.
And as each one is prais'd for her peculiar things;
So only she is rich, in mountains, meres, and springs,
And holds herself as great in her superfluous waste,
As others by their towns, and fruitful tillage grac'd."

And of fourteen, as Chapman's Homer.

" And as the mind of such a man, that hath a long way gone,
And either knoweth not his way, or else would let alone
His purposed journey, is distract."

The measure of twelve and fourteen syllables were often mingled by our old poets, sometimes in alternate lines, and sometimes in alternate couplets.

The verse of twelve syllables, called an Alexandrine, is now only used to diversify heroick lines.

" Waller was smooth, but Dryden taught to join
The varying verse, the full-resounding line,
The long majestick march, and energy divine." Pope.

The pause in the Alexandrine must be at the sixth syllable.

The verse of fourteen syllables is now broken into a soft lyrick measure of verses, consisting alternately of eight syllables and six.

" She to receive thy radiant name, Selects a whiter space." Fenton.

" When all shall praise, and ev'ry lay
Devote a wreath to thee,
That day, for come it will, that day
Shall I lament to see." Lewis to Pope.

" Beneath this tomb an infant lies
To earth whose body lent,
Hereafter shall more glorious rise,
But not more innocent.
When the Archangel's trump shall blow,
And souls to bodies join,
What crowds shall wish their lives below
Had been as short as thine!" Wesley.

(g) [The stanza in the trochaick measure of seven syllables is pleasingly diversified by our old poets: by Sir Philip Sidney in five lines:

" Well, in absence this will die;
Leave to see, and leave to wonder:
Absence sure will help, if I
Can learn how myself to sunder
From what in my heart doth lie." Astrophel & Stella, Song xi.

In six:

" O dear life, when shall it be
That mine eyes thine eyes may see?
And in them thy mind discover,
Whether absence have had force
Thy remembrance to divorce
From the image of the lover? Astrophel & Stella, Song x.

And Milton, in the same number, but with varied rhymes:

" Lord, my God, if I have thought
Or done this; if wickedness
Be in my hands; if I have wrought
Ill to him that meant me peace;
Or to him have render'd less,
And not freed my foe for nought:

" Let the enemy pursue my soul,
And overtake it; let him tread
My life down to the earth, and roll
In the dust my glory dead,
In the dust; and there outspread,
Lodge it with dishonour foul." Psalm vii.]

We have another measure very quick and lively, and therefore much used in (h) songs, which may be called the Anapestick in which the accent rests upon every third syllable.

" May I góvern my pássions with ábsolute swáy,
And grow wíser and bétter as lífe wears awáy." Dr. Pope.

In this measure a syllable is often retrenched from the first foot, as " Diógenes súrly and proúd." Dr. Pope.

" When présent we lóve, and when ábsent agrée,
I thínk not of I'ris, nor I'ris of me." Dryden.

These measures are varied by many combinations, and sometimes by double endings, either with or without rhyme, as in the heroick measure.

" 'Tis the divinity that stirs within us,
'Tis Heav'n itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man." Addison.

So in that of eight syllables,

" They neither added nor confounded,
They neither wanted nor abounded." Prior.

In that of (i) seven,

" For resistance I could fear none,
But with twenty ships had done,
What thou, brave and happy Vernon,
Hast achiev'd with six alone." Glover.

In that of six,

" 'Twas when the seas were roaring,
With hollow blasts of wind,
A damsel lay deploring,
All on a rock reclin'd." Gay.

In the anapestick,

" When terrible tempests assail us,
And mountainous billows affright,
Nor grandeur nor wealth can avail us,
But skilful industry steers right." Ballad.

To these measures, and their laws, may be reduced every species of English verse.

Our versification admits of few licences, except a synalœpha, or (k) elision of e in the before a vowel, as th' eternal; and more rarely of o in to, as t' accept; and a synœresis, by which two short vowels coalesce into one syllable, as question, special; or a word is contracted by the expulsion of a short vowel before a liquid, as av'rice, temp'rance.

Thus have I collected rules and examples, by which the English language may be learned, if the reader be already acquainted with grammatical terms, or taught by a master to those that are more ignorant. To have written a grammar for such as are not yet initiated in the schools, would have been tedious, and perhaps at last ineffectual.

(h) [Formerly this lively measure was not thought unworthy to be employed on sacred subjects. Archbishop Parker finished a poetical translation of the Psalms in 1557, and has applied it to the thirty-sixth.

" The wordes of his mouth be unrightfully wayed,
In sleyghty deceit be they craftely layed:
Quyte ceased he hath to behaue hym aryght,
Good deed for to do hath he driven from hys syght."]

(i) [This measure of seven, though not common, is a century older than the time of Glover, whom Dr. Johnson cites. There is a pleasing song of five stanzas in the poems of Thomas Jordan, who wrote in the middle of the seventeenth century, from which I will copy one: The book is not dated; but the reference to the song is sign. § §. 8.

" Private jarres shall be relinquish'd,
Every man shall have his owne;
Thine and mine shall be distinguish'd,
And no seeds of sorrow sowne;
Comfort come to all complayners,
That were frighted back with frowns;
Governours no more be gayners,
Which are now the kings of towns."]

(k) [These elisions are now little regarded. Indeed, the excessive brevity of the syllables, that is, of the second a in avarice, the second e in temperance, as also of the second vowels in every, general, barbarous, and the like, easily takes from them the power of forming a constituent part in the measure of a verse. But these vowels are not suppressed: they are pronounced like dactyls, as it were distinct, but short. In to and the also the vowels are audible enough, however the words are deformed by elision. As to the practice of several modern poets in filling up all the preterites and participles, as raised for rais'd, and distressed for distress'd or distrest, it seems an unnecessary, or rather an embarrassing, refinement. Words of this kind, which in prose consist of two emphatical syllables, will be used in poetry as one; but being printed without the distinctive mark of a strong syllable suppressed, and occurring twice or thrice in the same line, are certainly, in regard to a common reader, like the spells of other magicians, " of power to cheat the eye with bleat illusion, and give it false presentments."

APPENDIX, No. I.

[Grammatical Observations on the Old English Language, from Mr. Tyrwhitt's Essay on the Language and Versification of Chaucer.]

The following observations chiefly refer to the state in which the English language appears to have been about the time of Chaucer, and they will naturally divide themselves into two parts. The first will consider the remains of the ancient Saxon mass, however defaced or disguised by various accidents; the second will endeavour to point out the nature and effects of the accessions, which, in the course of near three centuries, it had received from Normandy.

I. For the sake of method, it will be convenient to go through the several parts of speech in the order in which they are commonly ranged by grammarians.

1. The Prepositive Article ꝛe, ꝛeo, ꝥat, (which answered to the ὁ, ἡ, τὸ, of the Greeks, in all its varieties of gender, case, and number,) had been long laid aside, and instead of it an indeclinable the was prefixed to all sorts of nouns, in all cases, and in both numbers.

2. The Declensions of the Nouns Substantive were reduced from six to one; and instead of a variety of cases in both numbers, they had only a Genitive case singular, which was uniformly deduced from the Nominative by adding to it es; or only s, if it ended in an e feminine; and that same form was used to express the (a) Plural number in all its cases: as, Nom. Shour, Gen. Shoures, Plur. Shoures. Nom. Name, Gen. Names, Plur. Names.

The Nouns Adjective had lost all distinction of Gender, Case, or Number.

3. The Primitive Pronouns retained one oblique case (b) in each number: as, Ic, or I; We: Obl. Me; Us: — Thou; Ye: Obl. Thee; You. — He, She; Hi (c), or They: Obl. Him, Hire; Hem, or Them.

Their Possessives were in the same state with the Adjectives; Min, Thin, His, Hire; Oure, Youre, Hir, or Their. (d)

The Interrogative and Relative Who had a Genitive and Accusative case, Whos, and Whom, but no variety of number.

On the contrary, the Demonstrative, This, and That, had a plural expression, Thise, and Tho, but no variety of case.

The other words, which are often, though improperly, placed in the class of Pronouns, were all become undeclined, like the Adjectives; except, Eyther, alteruter; Neyther, neuter; Other, alter; which had a Genitive case Singular, Eytheres, Neytheres, Otheres: Other, alius, had a Genitive case singular, and a Plural number, Otheres; and Aller (a corruption of ealꝑa) was still in use, as the Genitive Plural of Alle. (e)

(a) It is scarce necessary to take notice of a few Plurals, which were expressed differently, though their number was greater in the time of Chaucer than it is now. Some of them seem to retain their termination in en from the second Declension of the Saxons; as, oxen, eyen, hosen, &c. Others seem to have adopted it euphoniæ gratiâ; as, brethren, eyren, instead of bꝛoðꝛu, ægꝛu. And a few seem to have been always irregularly declined; as, men, wimmen, mice, lice, feet, &c. See Hickes, Gr. A. S. p. 11, 12.

(b) I take no notice here of the Genitive cases, min, thin, oure, youre, &c. as being at this time hardly ever distinguishable from Pronouns Possessive. How are we to know whether min boke should be rendered liber mei, or liber meus? In the Plural number, however, in a few instances, the Genitive case seems to have retained its proper power. C. T. v. 825. oure aller cok — would be more naturally translated — nostrûm omnium gallus, than noster omnium. And so in P. P. fol. cxi. Youre aller bele — vestrûm omnium salus; not, vestra.

(c) It is very difficult to say from whence, or why, the Pronouns, They, Them, and Their, were introduced into our language. The Saxon Pronouns, Hi, Hem, and Hir, seem to have been in constant use in the time of Robert of Gloucester. Sir John Mandeville and Chaucer use They, for Hi; but never, as I remember, (in the MSS. of authority) Them, or Their.

(d) The four last of these Possessive Pronouns were sometimes expressed a little differently, viz. Hires, Oures, Youres, and Hirs, or Theirs; as they are still, when the Noun to which they belong is understood, or when they are placed after it in a sentence. To the question, Whose book is this? we answer, Hers, Ours, Yours, or Theirs: or we declare; This book is Hers, Ours, &c. I can hardly conceive that the final s in these words is a mark of the Possessive (or Genitive) case, as a very able writer [Short Introduction to English Grammar, p. 35, 6.] seems to be inclined to think; because in the instances just mentioned, and in all which I have been able to find or to imagine, I cannot discover the least trace of the usual powers of the Genitive case. The learned Wallis, Gram. Ang. c. 7. has explained the use of these Pronouns without attempting to account for their form. He only adds; "Nonnulli hern, ourn, yourn, hisn, dicunt, pro hers, ours, &c. sed barbarè, nec quisquam (credo) sic scribere solet." If it could be proved that these words were antiently terminated in n, we might be led to conjecture that they were originally abbreviations of her own, our own, &c. the n being afterwards softened into s, as it has been in many other words.

(e) It may be proper here to take a little notice of the Pronoun, or Pronominal Adjective, Self, which our best Grammarians, from Wallis downwards, have attempted to metamorphose into a Substantive. In the Saxon language, it is certain that Sylf was declined like other Adjectives, and was joined in construction with Pronouns Personal and Substantives, just as ipse is in Latin. They said, Ic sylf, Ego ispe; Min sylfes, mei ipsius; Me sylfne, me ipsum, &c. Petrus sylf, Petrus ipse, &c. See Hickes, Gr. A. S. p. 26. In the age of Chaucer, Self, like other Adjectives, was become undeclined. Though he writes, Self, Selve, and Selven, those varieties do not denote any distinction of case or number; for he uses indifferently, himself and himselven; hemself and hemselven. He joins it with Substantives, in the sense of ipse, as the Saxons did. Canterb. Tales, v. 2862. In that selve grove. In illo ipso nemore, v. 4535. Thy selve neighebour. Ipse tuus vicinus. But his great departure from the antient usage was with respect to the Pronouns Personal prefixed to Self. Instead of declining them through the cases which they still retained, he uses constantly, Myself, for, I self. and, Me self; Thyself, for, Thou self, and, Thee self; Him self and Hire self, for, He self and She self; and in the Plural number, Our self, for, We self, and Us self; Your self, for, Ye self, and You self; and Hem self, for, They self.

It would be vain to attempt to defend this practice of Chaucer upon any principles of reason or grammatical analogy. All that can be said for it is, that perhaps any regular practice was preferable to the confusion and uncertainty which seems to have prevailed before. Accordingly, the writers who succeeded him following his example, it became a rule, as I

4. The Verbs, at the time of which we are treating, were very nearly reduced to the simple state in which they are at present.

They had four Modes, as now; the Indicative, the Imperative, the Subjunctive, and the Infinitive; and only two expressions of Time, the Present and the Past. All the other varieties of Mode and Time were expressed by Auxiliary Verbs.

In the inflections of their Verbs, they differed very little from us, in the Singular number: I love, Thou lovest, He loveth: but in the Plural they were not agreed among themselves; some (f) adhering to the old Saxon form; We loveth, Ye loveth, They loveth; and others adopting, what seems to have been, the Teutonic; We loven, Ye loven, They loven. In the Plural of the Past Tense the latter form prevailed universally: I loved, thou lovedst, he loved; We loveden, Ye loveden, They loveden.

The second person Plural in the Imperative Mode regularly terminated in eth; as Loveth ye (g); though the final consonants, according to the genius of the language, were frequently omitted, especially in verse.

The Saxon termination of the Infinitive in an had been long changed into en; to loven, to liven, &c. and they were beginning to drop the n; to love, to live.

The Participle of the Present Time began to be generally terminated in ing; as, loving; though the old form, which terminated in ende, or ande, was still in use; as, lovende, or lovande. The Participle of the Past Time continued to be formed, as the Past Time itself was, in ed; as loved; or in some contraction of ed (h); except among the Irregular Verbs (i), where for the most part it terminated in en; as, bounden, founden.

The greatest part of the Auxiliary Verbs were only in use in the Present and Past Tenses of their Indicative and Subjunctive Modes. They were inflected in those tenses like other Verbs, and were prefixed to the Infinitive Mode of the Verb to which they were Auxiliary. I shall loven; I will, or wool, loven; I may, or mow, loven; I can, or con, loven, &c. We shullen loven; We willen, or wollen, loven; We mowen loven; We connen loven, &c. In the Past tense, I (k) shulde loven; I wolde loven; I mighte, or moughte loven; I coude loven, &c. We shulden, we wolden, we mighten, or moughten, we couden loven, &c.

The Auxiliary To Haven was a complete Verb, and, being prefixed to the Participle of the Past time, was used to express the Preterperfect and Preterpluperfect Tenses. I have loved, Thou havest, or hast loved, He haveth, or hath loved; We haven, or han loved, &c. I hadde (l) loved, thou haddest loved, he hadde loved; We, ye, they, hadden loved.

The Auxiliary To ben was also a complete Verb, and, being prefixed to the Participle of the Past time, with the help of the other Auxiliary Verbs, supplied the place of the whole Passive voice, for which the Saxon language had no other form of expression. I am, thou art, he is loved; We, ye, they, aren, or ben loved. I was, thou wast, he was loved; We, ye, they, weren loved. (m) conceive, of the English language, that Personal Pronouns prefixed to Self were only used in one case in each number; viz. those of the First and Second Person in the Genitive case, according to the Saxon form, and those of the Third in the Accusative.

By degrees a custom was introduced of annexing Self to Pronouns in the Singular number only, and Selves (a corruption, I suppose, of Selven) to those in the Plural. This probably contributed to persuade our late Grammarians that Self was a Substantive; as the true English Adjective does not vary in the Plural number. Another cause of their mistake might be, that they considered my, thy, our, your, to which self is usually joined, as Pronouns Possessive; whereas I think it more probable that they were the Saxon Genitive cases of the Personal Pronouns. The metaphysical Substantive Self, of which our more modern Philosophers and Poets have made so much use, was unknown, I believe, in the time of Chaucer.

(f) In the quotation from Trevisa [See the Hist. of the Eng. Lang. p. 44.] it may be observed, that all his Plural Verbs of the Present Tense terminate in eth; whereas in Sir John Mandeville and Chaucer they terminate almost as constantly in en.

(h) The methods, by which the final ed of the Past Tense and its Participle was contracted or abbreviated, in the age of Chaucer, were chiefly the following:

1. By throwing away the d.

This method took place in Verbs, whose last Consonant was t, preceded by a Consonant. Thus caste, coste, hurte, putte, slitte, were used instead of, casted, costed, hurted, putted, slitted.

2. By transposing the d.

This was very generally done in Verbs, whose last Consonant was d, preceded by a Vowel. Thus, instead of, reded, leded, spreded, bleded, feded, it was usual to write, redde, ledde, spredde, bledde, fedde. — And this same method of transposition, I apprehend, was originally applied to shorten those words which we now contract by Syncope; as, lov'd, liv'd, smil'd, hear'd, fear'd, which were antiently written, lovde, livde, smilde, herde, ferde.

3. By transposing the d, and changing it into t.

This method was used, 1. in Verbs, whose last Consonant was t, preceded by a Vowel. Thus, letel, sweted, meted, were changed into, lette, swette, mette. — 2. in Verbs, whose last Consonant was d preceded by a Consonant. Thus, bended, bilded, girded, were changed into, bente, bilte, girte. — And generally, in Verbs, in which d is changed into t, I conceive that d was first transposed; so that dwelled, passed, dremed, feled, keped, should be supposed to have been first changed into, dwellde, passde, dremde, felde, kepde, and then into, dwelte, paste, dremte, felte, kepte.

4. The last method, together with a change of the radical vowel, will account for the analogy of a species of Verbs, generally reputed anomalous, which form their Past Time and its Participle, according to modern orthography, in ght. The process seems to have been thus. Bring, bringed, brongde, brogde, brogte; Think, thinked, thonkde, thokde, thokte; Teche, teched, tachde, tachte, &c. Only fought, from fighted, seems to have been formed by throwing away the d (according to method 1.) and changing the radical Vowel. See instances of similar contractions in the Francic language. Hickes, Gramm. Fr. Th. p. 66.

(i) I consider those verbs only as irregular, in which the Past Time and its Participle differ from each other. Their varieties are too numerous to be particularly examined here; but I believe there are scarce any, in which the deviations from the regular form will not appear to have been made by some method of contraction, or abbreviation, similar to those which have been pointed out in the last note among the Regular Verbs. The common termination of the Participle in en is clearly a substitution for ed, probably for the sake of a more agreeable sound; and it is often shortened, as ed has been shewn to be, by transposition. Thus, drawen, knowen, boren, stolen, were changed into drawne, knowne, borne, stolne.

(k) Shulde and Wolde are contracted from Shulled, and Wolled, by transposing the d, according to method 2.

Mighte and Moughte are formed from maghed and moghed, according to method 3. Maghed, maghde, maghte; Moghed, moghde, moghte.

Coude is from conned, by transposition of the d, and softening the n into u. It is often written couthe, and always so, I believe, when it is used as a Participle. In the same manner Bishop Douglas, and other Scottish writers, use Begouth as the Præterit of Begin. Begonned, begonde, begoud, begouthe.

(l) Hadde is contracted from Haved, as made is from maked. See Hickes, Gram. Fr. Th. p. 66.

(m) The Verb To do is considered by Wallis, and other later Grammarians, as an Auxiliary Verb. It is so used, though very rarely, by Chaucer. He more commonly uses it transitively: Do stripen me. Faites me depouiller. — Do me drenche. Faites me noyer. But still more frequently to save the repetition of a verb.

> His eyen twinkeled in his hed aright,
> As DON the sterres in a frosty night.

5. With respect to the indeclinable parts of Speech, it will be sufficient to observe here, that many of them still remained pure Saxon: the greatest number had undergone a slight change of a letter or two; and the more considerable alterations, by which some had been disfigured, were fairly deducible from that propensity to abbreviation, for which the inhabitants of this island have been long remarkable, though perhaps not more justly so than their neighbours.

II. Such was, in general, the state of the Saxon part of the English language when Chaucer began to write: let us now take a short view of the accessions, which it may be supposed to have received at different times from Normandy.

As the language of our Ancestors was complete in all its parts, and had served them for the purposes of discourse and even of composition in various kinds, long before they had any intimate acquaintance with their French neighbours, they had no call from necessity, and consequently no sufficient inducement, to alter its original and radical constitutions, or even its customary forms. Accordingly, we have just seen, that, in all the essential parts of Speech, the characteristical features of the Saxon idiom were always preserved; and we shall see presently, that the crowds of French words, which from time to time were imported, were themselves made subject, either immediately or by degrees, to the laws of that same idiom.

The words, which were thus imported, were chiefly Nouns Substantive, Adjectives, Verbs, and Participles. The Adverbs, which are derived from French Adjectives, seem to have been formed from them after they were Anglicised, as they have all the Saxon termination lich or ly (n), instead of the French ment. As to the other indeclinable parts of Speech, our language, being sufficiently rich in its own stores, has borrowed nothing from France, except perhaps an interjection or two.

The Nouns Substantive in the French language (as in all the other languages derived from the Latin) had lost their cases long before the time of which we are treating; but such of them as were naturalised here, seem all to have acquired a Genitive case, according to the corrupted Saxon form, which has been stated above. Their Plural number was also new modelled to the same form, if necessary; for in Nouns ending in e feminine, as the greater part of the French did, the two languages were already agreed. Nom. Flour, Gen. Floures, Plur. Floures. Nom. Dame, Gen. Dames, Plur. Dames.

On the contrary, the Adjectives, which at home had a distinction of Gender and Number, upon their naturalisation here, seem to have been generally stript of both, and reduced to the simple state of the English Adjective, without Case, Gender, or Number.

The French Verbs were obliged to lay aside all their differences of Conjugation. Accorder, souffrir, recevoir, descendre, were regularly changed into—accorden, suffren, receiven, descenden. They brought with them only two Tenses, the Present and the Past; nor did they retain any singularity of Inflection, which could distinguish them from other Verbs of Saxon growth.

The Participle indeed of the Present time, in some Verbs, appears to have still preserved its original French form; as usant, suffisant, &c.

The Participle of the Past time adopted, almost universally, the regular Saxon termination in ed; as accorded, suffred, received, descended. It even frequently assumed the prepositive particle ȝe, (or y, as it was latterly written,) which, among the Saxons, was very generally, though not peculiarly, prefixed to that Participle.

A Grammatical and Metrical Analysis of the first eighteen lines of the Canterbury Tales of Chaucer.

I. 1. Whanne, Sax. hpænne, is so seldom used as a Dissyllable by Chaucer, that for some time I had great doubts about the true reading of this line. I now believe that it is right, as here printed, and that the same word is to be pronounced as a Dissyllable in ver. 703. "But with these relikes whanne that he fond." Thanne, a word of the same form, occurs more frequently as a Dissyllable.

2. Shoures, Dis. Plural number. — 3. Sote. See ver. v.

II. 1. Perced. Dis. Participle of the Past Time. — 2. Rote; root.

III. 1. Bathed, Dis. See II. 1. — 2. Swiche, such; from Swilke; Sax. 3. Licoúr, Fr. has the accent upon the last syllable, after the French mode.

IV. 1. Vertúe, Fr. may be accented in the same manner. There is another way of preserving the harmony of this verse, by making whiche (from whilke, Sax.) a Dissyllable. Vertue may then be pronounced, as it is now, with the accent on the first; the second syllable being incorporated with the first of engendered.

V. 1. Sote, swote, sweete; sweet, Diss.

VI. 1. Enspired, Tris. Part. of Past Time.

VII. 1. Croppes, Dis. Pl. N. as shoures. I. 2. — 2. Yonge, Dis. Stronge and Longe are pronounced in the same manner.

VIII. 1. Halfe, or Halve, Dis. The original word is Halfen. — 2. Yronne; Run. Part. of the Past Time, with the Saxon prepositive particle ȝe, which in the MSS. of Chaucer is universally expressed by y, or i.

IX. 1. Smale, Dis. — 2. Foules, Dis. as Shoures. I. 2. — 3. Maken; make. Plural Number of the Present Tense.

X. 1. Slepen, as Maken. IX. 3. — 2. Alle, Dis.

XI. 1. Hem; Them. It is constantly used so by Chaucer. 2. Nature should perhaps be accented on the last syllable (or rather the last but one, supposing it a Trissyllable), after the French manner, though in the present case the verse will be sufficiently harmonious if it be accented on the first. That Chaucer did often accent it after the French manner appears from ver. 8778. 9842. 11657. 11945. 12229. In the same manner he accents Figúre, ver. 2037. 2045. Mesúre, ver. 8132. 8498. Asúre, Statúre, ver. 8130, 3. Peintúre, ver. 11967. Aventúre, ver. 1188. 1287. Creatúre, ver. 2397. 4884. and many other words of the same form, derived from the French language. — 3. Hir; Their. The Possessive Pronoun of the third Person Plural is variously written, Hir, Hire, Her, and Here; not only in different MSS. but even in the same page of good MSS. There seems to be no reason for perpetuating varieties of this kind, which can

Dr. Hickes has taken notice that do was used in this last manner by the Saxons: Gr. A. S. p. 77. and so was faire by the French, and indeed is still. It must be confessed, that the exact power, which do, as an auxiliary, now has in our language, is not easy to be defined, and still less to be accounted for from analogy.

(n) As rarely, continually, verally, bravely, &c. which correspond to the French adverbs, rarement, continuellement, veraiment, bravement, &c.

only have taken their rise from the unsettled state of our Orthography before the invention of Printing, and which now contribute more than any real alteration of the language to obscure the sense of our old Authors. In this edition, therefore, Hir is constantly put to signify Their; and Hire to signify Her, whether it be the Oblique case of the Personal Pronoun She, or the Possessive of the same Pronoun. — 4. Coráges, Fr. is to be accented on the Penultima. So Avantáge, ver. 2449. 4566. Brocáge, 3375. Foráge, ver. 3166. Lináge, ver. 4270. 5419. Serváge, ver. 1948. 4788. Costáge, ver. 5831. Paráge, ver. 5832.

XII. 1. Longen, as Maken. IX. 3. — 2. Gon, Infinitive Mode of Go, terminated in n according to the Saxon form.

XIII. 1. Pálmer'es, Dis. the e of the termination being cut out by Syncope, as it generally is in Plural Nouns of three Syllables, accented upon the first, and in the Past Tenses and their Participles of Verbs, of the same description ending in ed. The reason seems to be, that, where the Accent is placed so early, we cannot pronounce the final syllables fully, without laying more stress upon them, than they can properly bear. — 2. Seken, as Gon. XII. 2. — 3. Strange, Dis. Fr.

XIV. 1. Serve, Dis. from Serven, the n being thrown away before h. — 2. Halwes, Sax. ᵹalȝeꝛ. The Saxon ȝ is changed into w, as in sorwe, morwe, and some others; though it generally passes into y. The derivatives from this same word afford us instances of both forms; Holyness, Holy-day, All-Hallows-day. — 3. Couthe; known. The Participle of the Past Time from Connen, to know.

XV. And spécially from évery [1]shíres énde
XVI. Of Englelónd to Cánterbúry [2]they wénde,
XVII. The hóly blísful mártyr fór to séke,
XVIII. That [1]hém hath [2]hólpen, whán that théy were [3]séke.

XV. 1. Shires, Dis. Genitive Case Sing.

XVI. 1. Englelond, Trissyllable, from the Saxon Ꮷnȝlalanꝺa. — 2. The last foot consists of three syllables.

— to Cán | terbúr | y they wénde.

XVIII. 1. Hem; Them. See XI. 1. — 2. Holpen, the Participle of the Past Time from the Irregular Verb Help. — 3. Seke; Sick. As Chaucer usually writes this word Sike, we may suppose that in this instance he has altered the Orthography in order to make the Rime more exact; a liberty, with which he sometimes indulges himself, though much more sparingly than his contemporary Poets. The Saxon writers afford authorities to justify either method of spelling, as they use both Ꮪeoca and Ꮪioca.

I have hitherto considered these verses as consisting of ten syllables only; but it is impossible not to observe, that, according to the rules of pronunciation established above, all of them, except the 3d and 4th, consist really of eleven syllables. This is evident at first sight in ver. 11, 12, 13, 14, and might be shewn as clearly by authority or analogy in the others; but as the eleventh syllable, in our versification, being unaccented, may always, I apprehend, be absent or present without prejudice tot he metre, there does not seem to be any necessity for pointing it out in every particular instance.

DICTIONARY

OF THE

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Where this mark * follows the word, it signifies that such word is not to be found in the Dictionary of Dr. Johnson.

Where this mark † follows the word, it signifies that addition or alteration is made in respect either to the etymology, or definition, or example, of the word given by Dr. Johnson.

A, † The first letter of the European alphabets, has, in the English language, three different sounds, which may be termed the broad, open, and slender. This is Dr. Johnson's distinction of the sounds of this letter; which other grammarians augment. But, in fact, it has regularly only two sounds peculiar to itself; a short and a long one; all other sounds being irregular; and those of a are various, according to its combination with other letters.

The broad sound resembling that of the German a is found in many of our monosyllables, as all, wall, malt, salt; in which a is pronounced as au in cause, or aw in law. Many of these words were anciently written with au, as sault, waulk; which happens to be still retained in fault. This was probably the ancient sound of the Saxons, since it is almost uniformly preserved in the rustick pronunciation, and in the northern dialects, Dr. Johnson says; as, maun for man, haund for hand. But the northern pronunciation is rather that of mon, and hond or hont.

A open, not unlike the a of the Italians, is found, Dr. Johnson says, in father, rather, and more obscurely in fancy, fast, &c. This pronunciation is indeed found in rath, but not in its derivative rather, the a of which is usually uttered as in fancy.

A slender, or close, is the peculiar a of the English language, resembling the sound of the French e masculine, or diphthong ai in pais, or perhaps a middle sound between them, or between the a and e; to this the Arabick a is said nearly to approach. Of this sound we have examples in the words, place, face, waste, and all those that terminate in ation; as relation, nation, generation.

A is also, in some words, transient and unobserved, as in the last syllables of carriage and marriage; in others less faintly sounded, as in those of captain and chaplain; and in some obscurely uttered, as in collar, jocular, pillar, regular, where the sound most resembles that of short u.

A is short, as, glass, grass; or long, as, glaze, graze: it is marked long, generally, by an e final, as, plane, or by an i added, as plain. The short a is open, the long a close.

1. A, an article set before nouns of the singular number; a man, a tree; denoting the number one, as, a man is coming, that is, no more than one; or an indefinite indication, as, a man may come this way; that is, any man. This article has no plural signification. Before words beginning with a vowel and h mute, and also aspirated words accented on the second syllable, it is written an; as, an ox, an egg, an honour, an habitual practice. Formerly an preceded all words beginning with h. Indeed an is the original article from the Saxon. The Saxons wrote an ϸpeop, a tree, an ϸeopa, a few; which succeeding times contracted into a. It is the adjective ane, æn, an, one; applied as the French and Italians apply their numerals un, une; the Dutch their een; and the Germans their ein.

2. A taken materially, or for itself, is a noun; as, a great A, a little a.

> Truly, were I great A, before I would be willing to be so abused, I should wish myself little a, a thousand times. Wallis's Correct. of Hobbes, § 5.

3. A is placed before a participle, or participial noun; and is considered by Wallis as a contraction of at, when it is put before a word denoting some action not yet finished; as, I am a walking. It also seems to be anciently contracted from at, when placed before local surnames; as Thomas a Becket. In other cases, it seems to signify to, like the French à. And in some cases, Dr. Johnson might have added, it signifies in.

> A hunting Chloë went. Prior.
> They go a begging to a bankrupt's door. Dryden.
> May peace still slumber by these purling fountains!
> Which we may every year
> Find when we come a fishing here. Wotton.

Now the men fell a rubbing of armour, which a great while had lain oiled. Wotton.

He will knap the spears a pieces with his teeth. More, Antid. against Atheism.

Another falls a ringing a Pescennius Niger, and judiciously distinguishes the sound of it to be modern. Addison on Medals.

His lordship might allude to the proverb of Italy, "Me venga la morte di Spagna." Let my death come from Spain: For then it is sure to be long a coming.

Bacon, Report in the House of Commons.

Let 'em brew and bake too, husband, a God's name. B. & Fl. Knight of the Burn. Pes. iii. 1.

Let such, a God's name, with fine wheat be fed. Pope, Wife of Bath, v. 48.

4. A, prefixed to many or few, implies one whole number, an aggregate of few or many collectively taken; and, subjoined to many, denotes sometimes an object separately considered.

Told of a many thousand warlike French. Shakspeare.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few. Swift.

Full many a flower is born to blush unseen. Gray.

5. A has a peculiar signification, denoting the proportion of one thing to another. Thus we say, The landlord hath a hundred a year; The ship's crew gained a thousand pounds a man.

The river Inn passes through a wide open country, during all its course through Bavaria; which is a voyage of two days, after the rate of twenty leagues a day. Addison on Italy.

6. A is used in burlesque poetry, to lengthen out a syllable, without adding to the sense.

For cloves and nutmeg to the line-a,
And even for oranges to China. Dryden.

7. A is sometimes, in familiar writings, put by a barbarous corruption for he; as, will a come, for will he come.

Stand here by me, Master Robert Shallow; I will make the king do you grace; I will leer upon him as 'a comes by.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. ii.

By the faith of my body 'a has put me into such a fright, that I tremble (as they say) as 'twere an aspine leaf.

Beaum. & Fl. Kn. of the Burn. Pes. iii. 1.

8. It is also a barbarous corruption for have.

I had not thought my body could a yielded
All those foul scurvy names that she has call'd me. Beaum. & Fl. Wit at sev. Weapons, iii. 1.

9. A, in composition, seems to have sometimes the power of the French à, in these phrases, à droit, à gauche, &c. and sometimes to be contracted from at, Dr. Johnson says; as, aside, aslope, afoot, asleep, athirst, aware. Yet some of these are not so contracted. They are the same as on side, on foot, on sleep. So adays was formerly written on days; aboard, on board; ablaze, on blaze; and arow, on row. As to the augment a, as, in aweary, (one of the examples produced in this division by Dr. Johnson,) this not inelegant usage yet obtains, though less than in a very brilliant era of our literature, the time of Addison. Thus ameliorate is written instead of meliorate. Thus, formerly alongeth by Gower, for longeth; adaunt by Skelton, for daunt, &c. The composition of such words is explained by Lye in his Anglo-Saxon Dictionary. A, he says, is an initial augment, commonly altering nothing in the sense of the word; whence, in the modern language it is generally omitted: Thus from the Saxon abpæcan, we have the English to break. And it is to be observed that a, be, ƿop, ȝe, ꝺo, are often indifferently and interchangeably prefixed to the past tense of verbs, to participles of the past tense, and to verbal nouns.

It may here also be noticed, that there are words, of which the a is become so component a part as not to be displaced; as, afresh, alive, aloud, anew.

I 'gin to be a-weary of the sun;
And wish the state o' the world were now undone. Shaksp. Macbeth.

And now a breeze from shore began to blow,
The sailors ship their oars, and cease to row;
Then hoist their yards a-trip, and all their sails
Let fall, to court the wind, and catch the gales. Dryden, Ceyx and Alcyone.

A little house with trees a-row,
And like its master very low. Pope, Hor.

10. A is sometimes redundant; as, arise, arouse, awake; the same with rise, rouse, wake. See the preceding paragraph.

11. A, in abbreviations, stands for artium, or arts; as, A. B. batchelor of arts, artium baccalaureus; A. M. master of arts, artium magister; or anno; as, A. D. anno domini.

12. A, with the addition of the two Latin words per se, meaning by itself, is used by our elder writers to denote a nonesuch. It may have been adopted from the custom of the child's school, in which every letter, we may presume, was taught to be expressed per se. So we find in 1612, a pamphlet published with the title of "O per se O, or a Newe Cryer of Lanthorne and Candle Light;" and in another publication, called "Wits Recreations, I per se." But the phrase is as old as the times of Chaucer, who calls "faire Creseide the flowre and a per se of Troie and Greece." Test. of Creseide. Mr. Boucher has assimilated this phrase to "I am alpha," Rev. 8. which Junius had before done. But they are incorrect. For, as Dr. Jamieson has well observed, the force of the one metaphor lies in the use of a by itself; of the other, in its being connected with omega, as denoting Him, who is not only the First, but the Last. See Scottish Etymolog. Dictionary. They both refer, however, to the use of alpha among the Romans in the sense of a principal or distinguished person, as Martial calls Codrus, "alpha penulatorum," i. e. king of the beggars. In our old dramatick writers the phrase per se is found without a, and also with the duplication of the letter.

In faith, my sweet honeycomb, I'll love thee a per se a. Wily Beguiled, (1635.)

AARO'NICAL.* adj. That relates to the priesthood of Aaron.

The state of the New Testament must be more perfect than the law; but, in the law, there was one high pastor, the high priest on earth; therefore there must be one now also, and much rather. I answer, we have him indeed, our chief bishop and high priest, of whom the Aaronical priest was but a shadow, namely, Jesus Christ.

Fulke's Retentive, p. 256.

It [the surplice] was ordained by God to be worn, under the Aaronical priesthood.

Lewis's Scourge, in Vin. of Ch. of Eng. No. 14.

AB,† at the beginning of the names of places, generally shews that they have some relation to an abbey, as, Abingdon. Gibson.

This town of Abingdon was written, abban-ꝺune, abbatiæ mons vel collis. Lye.

A'BACIST.* n. s. [Fr. abaciste, Lat. abacista.] One who casts accounts; a calculator. See ABACUS.

A noble heart ought not the sooner yield,
Nor shrink abacke for any weal or woe.

Mir. for Mag. p. 359.

2. A sea term. Backward with the sails flatted against the mast. Dict.

ABA'CK.* n. s. [Fr. abaque, Lat. abacus.] A plinth, or flat square stone, on the capital of a pillar; as Cotgrave defines it. See also ABACUS. Ben Jonson uses it simply for a square surface.

In the center or midst of the pegm, there was an aback or square, in which this elogy was written. Coronation Pageant.

A'BACOT.* n. s. The word is noticed in the old French glossaries, and is called by Cowel, the cap of state, used in old times by our English kings, wrought up in the figure of two crowns.

ABA'CTOR.† n. s. [Latin.] One who drives away or steals cattle in herds, or great numbers at once, in distinction from those that steal only a sheep or two. This is Dr. Johnson's definition of the word from Blount. The word was probably used formerly, like the old French abacteur, for a thief in general. Thus the obsolete adjective abacted, i. e. carried away by violence, yet exists in our old glossaries; as also the obsolete substantive abaction.

A'BACUS. n. s. [Latin.]

1. A counting-table, anciently used in calculations.

2. [In architecture.] The uppermost member of a column, which serves as a sort of crowning both to the capital and column. Dict.

ABA'FT.† adv. [Goth. aftaro, Sax. abaftan, behind.] From the fore-part of the ship, towards the stern. Dict.

ABAI'SANCE. n. s. [from the French abaisser, to depress, to bring down.] An act of reverence, a bow. Obeysance is considered by Skinner as a corruption of abaisance, but is now universally used.

To ABA'LIENATE.† v. a. [from abalieno, Lat.]

1. To make that another's which was our own before. A term of the civil law, not much used in common speech.

2. To estrange; to withdraw the affection.

ABALIENA'TION. n. s. [Lat. abalienatio.] The act of giving up one's right to another person; or a making over an estate, goods, or chattels by sale, or due course of law. Dict.

To ABA'ND.† v. a. [A word contracted from abandon, but not now in use. See ABANDON.] To forsake.

They stronger are
Then they which sought at first their helping hand,
And Vortiger enforc'd the kingdom to aband.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. x. 65.

Which when Severus old did understand,
All pleasures quite and joys he did aband,
Pursuing war. Mir. for Mag. p. 172.

To ABA'NDON.† v. a. [Fr. abandonner. Derived according to Menage, from the Italian abbandonare, which signifies to forsake his colours; bandum [vexillum] deserere. Pasquier thinks it a coalition of à ban donner, to give up to a proscription; in which sense we, at this day, mention the ban of the empire. So abanneb, Sax. Chron. denounced. Ban, in our own old dialect, signifies a curse; and to abandon, if considered as compounded between French and Saxon, is exactly equivalent to diris devovere. To this etymology, admitted by Dr. Johnson, I must add, that the Moes-Goth. bandi, a band or chain, with the preposition af, i. e. af-band, loosed from the chain, set at liberty, has been also offered as the etymological explanation. But Wachter gives the old Goth. band, a standard; implying, that he who abandons himself to a particular person or purpose, enlists himself under the standard of the same; and so derives the word secondarily from band and donner. So, in one of our very ancient songs, "I am in hir bandoun," means, "I am at her command."]

1. To give up, resign, or quit; often followed by the particle to; and formerly used in a good sense, but not in later times.

There founden thei at home sittynge
Lucrece, his wife, all environed
With women, which were abandoned
To werche; and she wrought eke withall.
Gower, Conf. Am. b. 7.

With worthie knightes environed,
The kynge hym selfe, hath abandoned
To the temple in good intent.
Gower, Conf. Am. b. 8.

If she be so abandon'd to her sorrow,
As it is spoke, she never will admit me.
Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

The passive gods behold the Greeks defile
Their temples, and abandon to the spoil
Their own abodes: we, feeble few, conspire
To save a sinking town involved in fire.

With frequent rites, and pure, avow'd thy power,

Pope, Odyssey, i. 80.

2. To desert; to forsake: in an ill sense.

'Tis right, quoth he; thus misery doth part
The flux of company. Shaks. As you like it.

Scorn'd by my foes, abandoned by my friends.
Dryden, Æn. 2.

But to the parting goddess thus she pray'd;
Propitious still be present to my aid,
Nor quite abandon your once favour'd maid.
Dryden, Fables.

The parts that God gave them they held in unrighteousness, sloth, and sensuality; and this made God to desert and abandon them to themselves; so that they have had a doting and a decrepit reason long before age had given them such a body. South, Serm. ii. 259.

3. To forsake; to leave.

He boldly spake, Sir knight, if knight thou be,
Abandon this forestalled place at erst,
For fear of further harm, I counsel thee.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. iv. 39.

Abandon soon, I read, the caytive spoil,
Of that same outcast carcas. Sp. F. Q. ii. viii. 12.

4. To drive away; to banish.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

To ABANDON OVER.† v. a. [A form of writing not usual, perhaps not exact.] To give up to, to resign.

Look on me as a man abandoned o'er
To an eternal lethargy of love;
To pull, and pinch, and wound me, cannot cure,
And but disturb the quiet of my death.
Dryden, Sp. Friar.

Abandoning themselves over to spending and sensuality; and, for one particular, immoderate drinking; are evil dispositions to eminency, and will make them both unable to maintain the public good, and unfit to govern others.
Dr. J. White's Ser. at Paul's Cross, (1615,) p. 22.

ABA'NDON.* n. s. [The French, in their elder glossaries, interpret this word licence, or liberty; in later times, relinquishment; as "l'abandon des biens du monde." In which sense, our language exhibits the word applied both to things and persons.]

1. A forsaker; he who has abandoned or left a thing.

A friar, an abandon of the world, a man wholly rapt with divine affections and extasies.
Sir E. Sandys' State of Religion.

2. A relinquishment.

These heavy exactions have occasioned an abandon of all mines but what are of the richer sort. Ld. Kames.

ABA'NDONED.† particip. adj. Corrupted in the highest degree; as, an abandoned wretch. In this sense, it is a contraction of a longer form, abandoned [given up] to wickedness.

The confusion he was in, upon such an unexpected provocation, extremely disordered him, and he immediately sent away this abandoned prostitute with great indignation.
Nelson, Life of Bp. Bull, p. 459.

ABA'NDONER.* n. s. [Fr. abandonneur.] A forsaker. "Desertor; qui laisse et abandonne;" as Huloet explains it. Cotgrave, who gives the word abandoner also, adds to these definitions, "a prostitutor of."

Oh! sacred, shadowy, cold, and constant queen,
Abandoner of revels, mute, contemplative!
Beaum. & Fl. Two Nob. Kinsmen, v. 5.

Betrayers and abandoners of that trust.
Burnet's Life of Bp. Bedell, p. 49.

ABA'NDONING.† n. s. [from abandon.] This is an old English noun, found in Huloet, Barret, and Minsheu; and by them interpreted a leaving or forsaking. Dr. Johnson has cited an example of the word abandoning from Clarendon, by whom however it is used not as a noun, but as a participle; as the passage will shew. I produce from Bishop Hall a forcible application of the substantive.

He hoped his past meritorious actions might outweigh his present abandoning the thought of future action. Clarendon, Hist. b. viii.

What is it that Satan can despair persuading men unto, if he can draw them to an unnatural abandoning of life, and pursuit of death?

Speech of W. Pitt, Feb. 3. 1800.

2. The state of being abandoned.

ABARTICULA'TION. n. s. [from ab, from, and articulus, a joint, Lat.] A good and apt construction of the bones, by which they move strongly and easily; or that species of articulation that has manifest motion. Dict.

To ABA'SE.† v. a. [Fr. abaisser, from the Lat. basis, or bassus, a barbarous word, signifying low, base; or from the Ital. abbassare. These and also the Span. abaxar, to lessen or keep under, are all referrible to the Gr. Βασις, the foot of a pillar. Hence to abase is as much as to say, mettre à bas. Gower writes the word abesse. A later writer gives it in the form of abass.

"The same Almightie eternal God abassed the estimacion and autoritie of the nobles and gentlemen, &c." M. Wood, Transl. of Gardiner's De Vera Obed. (1553,) Pref. sign. a. ii.

Abas'd your daughter, and exalted me.
Dryden, Fables.

If the mind be curbed and humbled too much in children; if their spirits be abased and broken much by too strict an hand over them; they lose all their vigour and industry.
Locke on Education, § 46.

ABA'SED. adj. [with heralds] a term used of the wings of eagles, when the top looks downwards towards the point of the shield; or when the wings are shut; the natural way of bearing them being spread with the top pointing to the chief of the angle. Bailey and Chambers.

ABA'SEMENT.† n. s. The state of being brought low; the act of bringing low; depression.

There is an abasement because of glory; and there is that lifteth up his head from a low estate. Ecclesiasticus, xx. 11.

The devil could not appear in human shape, whilst man was in his integrity; because he was a spirit fallen from his first glorious perfection, and therefore must appear in such shape, which might argue his imperfection and abasement, which was the shape of a beast. Mede, Disc. xl.

To ABA'SH.† v. a. [Fr. abaisser, Dr. Johnson says. Ital. abbassare. Some also assign the Fr. esbahir, to affrighten, as the etymology of our English word; but the Fr. abaisser, is nearer of kin to it. "The Heb. lebesh, to clothe, comprehends the idea of besh, shame; whence our abash, and bashful." Rev. Mr. Jones of Nayland. In Wiclif and Chaucer we have the verb abais, and its pret. abaisit, for abash, and abashed. The Scotch also use abaist in the same sense. The verb abaw, peculiar to Chaucer, no doubt is derived from esbahir. Barret in his ancient Alvearie or Dictionary, translates "to be abashed or astonied" by "etre abachè et espouvantè." After all, we must look to the Sax. beɼceaban. See To BASH.]

1. To put into confusion; to make ashamed. It generally implies a sudden impression of shame.

They heard and were abash'd. Milt. P. L. i. 313.

This heard, the imperious queen sat mute with fear;
Nor further durst incense the gloomy thunderer.
Silence was in the court at this rebuke:
Nor could the gods, abash'd, sustain their sovereign's look. Dryd. Fables.

2. The passive admits the particle at, sometimes of, before the causal noun.

In no wise speak against the truth, but be abashed of the errour of thy ignorance. Eccles. iv. 25.

I said unto her, from whence is this kid? Is it not stolen? But she replied upon me, it was given for a gift, more than the wages: however, I did not believe her, and I was abashed at her. Tobit, ii. 13, 14.

In the admiration only of weak minds
Led captive: cease to admire, and all her plumes
Fall flat, and sink into a trivial toy,
At every sudden slighting quite abasht.
Milt. P. L. ii. 223.

The little Cupids hov'ring round,
As pictures prove, with garlands crown'd,
Abash'd at what they saw and heard,
Flew off, nor ever more appear'd. Swift, Miscel.

ABA'SHMENT.* n. s. [from abash.] That this excellent old word should have escaped the notice of Mr. Boucher, surprises me. It is found in our oldest glossaries; in those of Huloet, Barret, and Minsheu; and is interpfeted, "a great fear or astonying, consternatio;" and also, "hontissement, verecundia." The judicious use of the word, in modern times, has also been overlooked. Gower uses abash as a substantive.

1. The state of being ashamed.

She was afrayde;
The ruddy shamefastness in her vysage fyll,
Which manner of abashment became her not yll.
Skelton's Poems, p. 38.

In the utmost abashment and consternation of mind, pulling up a good heart, and taking breath, Lipsius most submissively begged pardon of his majesty for any fault he might have committed.
Translation of Boccalini, (1626,) p. 21.

2. Cause of confusion.

Methinks it may be some abashment to reason, and that vast perfection to which some men would extol it, that it scarce knows what Man or Itself is. Ellis's Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 54.

To ABA'TE.† v. a. [Fr. abbatre, Ital. abbatere, Sp. abatir; which in one sense signify to beat down; in another, to substract, as in arithmetick. See Dr. Johnson's third definition of this word. Some have proposed the privative a and the Belg. batte, which means profit or interest; because, by diminishing a thing it becomes less profitable. Barret has defined abating as an arithmetical substraction, viz. withdrawing from a greater sum.]

1. To lessen; to diminish.

Who can tell whether the divine wisdom, to abate the glory of those kings, did not reserve this work to be done by a queen, that it might appear to be his own immediate work?
Sir John Davies on Ireland.

If you did know to whom I gave the ring,
And how unwillingly I left the ring,
You would abate the strength of your displeasure.
Shakspeare.

Here we see the hopes of great benefit and light from expositors and commentators are in a great part abated: and those who have most need of their help, can receive but little from them.
Locke, Essay on St. Paul's Epist.

2. To deject, or depress the mind.

This iron world
Brings down the stoutest hearts to lowest state:
For misery doth bravest minds abate.
Spenser, M. Hubberd's Tale.

Have the power still
To banish your defenders, till at length
Your ignorance deliver you,
As most abated captives to some nation
That won you without blows. Shaks. Coriol.

Time that changes all, yet changes us in vain,
The body, not the mind; nor can controul
Th' immortal vigour, or abate the soul.
Dryden, Æneid.

3. In commerce, to let down the price in selling, sometimes to beat down the price in buying.

In letting leases of his impropriations, if he found the curates' wages but small, he would abate much of his fine to increase their pensions.
Sir G. Paul's Life of Abp. Whitgift, p. 38.

To ABA'TE. v. n.

1. To grow less: as his passion abates; the storm abates. It is used sometimes with the particle of before the thing lessened.

Our physicians have observed, that in process of time, some diseases have abated of their virulence, and have, in a manner, worn out their malignity, so as to be no longer mortal.
Dryden, Hind and Panther.

2. [In common law.]

It is in law used both actively and neuterly; as, to abate a castle, to beat it down. To abate a writ, is, by some exception, to defeat or overthrow it. A stranger abateth, that is, entereth upon a house or land void by the death of him that last possessed it, before the heir take his possession, and so keepeth him out. Wherefore as he that putteth out him in possession, is said to dissese: so he that steppeth in between the former possessor and his heir, is said to abate. In the neuter signification thus: The writ of the demandment shall abate, that is, shall be disabled, frustrated, or overthrown. The appeal abateth by covin, that is, that the accusation is defeated by deceit. Cowel.

3. [In horsemanship.] A horse is said to abate or take down his curvets; when, working upon curvets, he puts his two hind-legs to the ground both at once, and observes the same exactness in all the times. Dict.

ABA'TEMENT.† n. s. [abatement, Fr.]

1. The act of abating or lessening.

Xenophon tells us, that the city contained about ten thousand houses, and allowing one man to every house, who could have any share in the government, (the rest consisting of women, children, and servants) and making other obvious abatements, these tyrants, if they had been careful to adhere together, might have been a majority even of the people collectively.
Swift, on the Cont. in Athens and Rome.

2. The state of being abated.

Coffee has, in common with all nuts, an oil strongly combined and entangled with earthy particles. The most noxious part of oil exhales in roasting to the abatement of near one quarter of its weight. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. The sum or quantity taken away by the act of abating.

Another art of charity he had; the selling of corn to his poor neighbours, at a rate below the market-price; which though, as he said, he had reason to do, gaining thereby the charge of portage, was a great benefit to them, who besides the abatement of price, and possibly forbearance, saved thereby a day's work.
Fell's Life of Hammond, sect. 1.

The law of works is that law, which requires perfect obedience, without remission or abatement: so that by that law, a man cannot be just, or justified, without an exact performance of every tittle. Locke.

4. The cause of abating: extenuation.

As our advantages towards practising and promoting piety and virtue were greater than those of other men: so will our excuse be less, if we neglect to make use of them. We cannot plead in abatement of our guilt, that we were ignorant of our duty, under the prepossession of ill habits and the bias of a wrong education. Atter. Serm.

5. [In law.] The act of the abator; as, the abatement of the heir into the land before he hath agreed with the lord. The affection or passion of the thing abated; as abatement of the writ. Cowel.

Abaters of acrimony or sharpness, are expressed oils of ripe vegetables, and all preparations of such; as of almonds, pistachoes, and other nuts.
Arbuthnot on Diet.

A'BATIS.* n. s. [Fr.] A military term; of which our military dictionaries, however, give us no other explanation than that it means trees cut down, and so laid with their branches, &c. turned towards the enemy, as to form a defence for troops stationed behind them. Borel, in his Treasury of old French words, and also Lacombe, explains abateis or abbatis as meaning a forest or wood; but Roquefort impugns this explanation, and defines it carnage, destruction, from advastatio.

ABA'TOR. n. s. [A law term.] One who intrudes into houses or land, void by the death of the former possessor, and yet not entered upon or taken up by his heir. Dict.

A'BBACY. n. s. [Lat. abbatia.] The rights or privileges of an abbot. See ABBEY.

According to Felinus, an abbacy is the dignity itself, since an abbot is a term or word of dignity, and not of office; and, therefore, even a secular person, who has the care of souls, is sometimes, in the canon law, also stiled an abbot.
Ayliffe's Parergon Juris Canonici.

ABBA'TIAL.* adj. [Fr.] Relating to an abbey. It is quite a modern word.

Abbatial government was probably much more favourable to national prosperity, than baronial authority.
Sir F. Eden on the State of the Poor, p. 50.

A'BBESS.† n. s. [Lat. abbatissa, from whence the Saxon abbaðiꝛꝛa, abuðiꝛꝛe, then probably abuciꝛꝛe, and by contraction abbesse in Fr. and abbess, Eng. And formerly also abbiess, as in the Mirour for Magistrates, p. 235.] The superiour or governess of a nunnery or monastery of women.

Of these, some in England were mitred, some not; those that were mitred were exempted from the jurisdiction of the diocesan, having in themselves episcopal authority within their precincts, and being also lords of parliament. The other sort were subject to the diocesan in all spiritual government. See ABBEY.
Cowel.

This is an excellent abbreviature of the whole duty of a Christian. Bp. Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

ABBREUVOI'R. [In French, a watering-place. Ital. abbeverato, dal verbo bevere. Lat. bibere. Abbeverari i cavalli. To A'BDICATE.† v. a. [Lat. abdico.]

1. To give up right; to resign; to lay down an office. Mr. Malone thinks, that at the time of the Revolution, the managers and penners of the Bill of Rights doubtless carefully examined the history of the deposition of Richard II. and in Hall's Chronicle found the word which created so much debate. But it had been long before an established word.

Now it was no mastery to persuade a man being desperate, pensife, and full of dolour, to abdicate himselfe from his empire and imperiall pre-eminence. Hall's Chron. fol. viii. b.

It is covered with several muscles, from whose alternate relaxations and contractions in respiration, digestion is forwarded, and the due motion of all the parts therein contained promoted, both for secretion and expulsion. Quincy.

The abdomen consists of parts containing and contained. Wiseman, Surgery.

This word is used, Dr. Johnson says, by Wood in his Athenæ Oxonienses, where, mentioning Farnaby the critick, he relates, that in some part of his life, he was reduced to follow the trade of an abecedarian by his misfortunes. To ABE'T.† v. a. [from betan, Sax. signifying, Dr. Johnson says, to enkindle or animate. So in old Fr. abetter means to incite or animate. The word may also be traced to the Goth. beita, having a similar meaning.] To push forward another, to support him in his designs by connivance, encouragement, or help. It was once indifferent, but is almost always taken by modern writers, in an ill sense; as may be seen in ABETTER.

AB'ET.* n. s. [from the verb.] The act of abetting or assisting. Not now in use.

I am thine eme; the shame were unto me
As well as thee, if that I should assent

The meede of thy mischalenge and abet.

ABE'TMENT.† n. s. The act of abetting.

When the principal reason of their excuse should cease, namely, these fresh stirrings so near them, which seemed to require their abetment, then they would give us more particular satisfaction. Wotton's Rem. p. 542.

ABE'TTER, or ABE'TTOR, n. s. One that abets; the supporter or encourager of another.

ABEY'ANCE.† n. s. [old Fr. abaizance, abbaiaunce, in expectation; bayer, beer, attendre avec impressement, to look eagerly after some advantage; as, "bayer à l'argent;" so beance, "en beiance," in expectation of. Dr. Johnson assents to the derivation of the word from aboyer, allatrare, to bark at; which is not to be defended. Abeyance is expectation; though now only a forensick term.] This word, in Littleton, cap. Discontinuance, is thus used. The right of fee-simple lieth in abeyance, when it is all only in the remembrance, intendment, and consideration of the law. The frank tenement of the glebe of the parsonage, is in no man during the time that the parsonage is void, but is in abeyance. Cowel.

Sometimes the fee may be in abeyance, that is, as the word signifies, in expectation, remembrance, and contemplation of law; there being no person in esse, in whom it can rest and abide; though the law considers it as always potentially existing, and ready to vest, whenever a proper owner appears. Black. Comm.

To A'BGREGATE.* [Lat. abgrego.] To lead out of the flock. The old dictionaries which furnished Dr. Johnson with abgregation, exhibit also abgregate; and therefore this word is noticed.

Taylor, Artif. Handsom.* p. 134.

The lower clergy were railed at, for disputing the power of the bishops, by the known abhorrers of episcopacy, and abused for doing nothing in the convocations, by these very men who wanted to bind up their hands. Swift, Ex. No. 21.

ABHO'RRING.† n. s. [from abhor.] Dr. Johnson cites an instance of the word abhorring as a participial noun, which he defines, "The object of abhorrence;" but considers it not to be the proper use of such a noun. The word, however, is an old English substantive, which Barret defines, "Abhorring of things, or lothing; desire or will to vomit: Nausea." Such is the use of the word in Donne. The second example belongs to Dr. Johnson's definition.

I find no decay in my strength; my provisions are not cut off; I find no abhorring in my appetite. Donne's Devotions, p. 233.

They shall go forth, and look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh. Isaiah, lxvi. 44.

To ABI'DE.† v.a. [Of the participle abid, Dr. Johnson says, he found only the example which he brings from Woodward; and should rather determine that abide in the active sense has no passive participle, or compounded preterite. Abidden, however, is found in our dictionaries of the seventeenth century; and is translated into the French attendu, demeuré, and duré. In Chaucer and Gower the preter abit is found; and Chaucer also uses abiden and abidden. Woodward's usage of abid has been preceded in the translation of part of the Æneid by Phayer; and by Turbervile; poets of the sixteenth century; and Hale writes, "a law that hath abidden the test of time."]

There are some abjurations still in force among us here in England; as by the statute of the 25th of king Charles II. all persons that are admitted into any office, civil or military, must take the test; which is an abjuration of some doctrines of the Church of Rome.

There is likewise another oath of abjuration, which laymen and clergymen are both obliged to take; and that is, to abjure the Pretender. Ayliffe, Par. Juris Canonici.

A manly man, to be an abbot able. Chau. Prol.

To A'BLE.† v.a. To make able; to enable, which Dr. Johnson says, is the word commonly used. But the example which he has given of able, from Shakspeare, seems to present the word under another signification; that of uphold. I will therefore illustrate its first sense.

Ld. Ch. Thurlow, in the Life of Sir M. Foster.

ABSE'NTMENT.* n. s. [from absent.] The state of being absent.

All other phrases and circumlocutions, by which human death is expressed either in holy Scripture, or in usual language—such for instance, as these in Scripture, a peregrination, or absentment from the body, &c. might easily be shewed to be applicable to the death of our Saviour.

Barrow's Works, ii. 383.

ABSI'NTHIAN.* adj. [from absinthium.] Partaking of the nature of wormwood.

To ABSO'LVE. v. a. [absolvo, Lat.]

1. To clear, to acquit of a crime in a judicial sense.

Enjoy past dangers, and absolve the stars. Tickell.

Compell'd by threats to take that bloody oath,
And the act ill, I am absolv'd of both.

Waller, Maid's Trag.

This command, which must necessarily comprehend the persons of our natural fathers, must mean a duty we owe them, distinct from our obedience to the magistrate, and from which the most absolute power of princes cannot absolve us. Locke.

3. To pronounce sin remitted, in the ecclesiastical sense.

But all is calm in this eternal sleep;
Here grief forgets to groan, and love to weep;
Ev'n superstition loses every fear;
For God, not man, absolves our frailties here.

Pope, Eloisa to Abelard.

4. To finish, to complete. This use is not common.

What cause
Mov'd the Creator, in his holy rest
Through all eternity, so late to build
In chaos; and the work begun, how soon
Absolv'd. Milton, P. L. vii. 94.

If that which is so supposed infinitely distant from what is now current, is distant from us by a finite interval, and not infinitely, then that one circulation which preceded it, must necessarily be like ours, and consequently absolved in the space of twenty-four hours. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

ABSO'LVER.* n. s. [from absolve.] One who pronounces sins remitted.

They that take upon them to be the only absolvers of sin, are themselves held fast in the snares of eternal death. More, Against Idolatry, Preface.

A sin-absolver. Shakspeare, Romeo and Juliet.

A'BSOLUTE.† adj. [absolutus, Lat.]

1. Complete; applied as well to persons as things.

Because the things that proceed from him are perfect, without any manner of defect or maim; it cannot be but that the words of his mouth are absolute, and lack nothing which they should have, for performance of that thing whereunto they tend. Hooker, b. ii. § 6.

What is his strength by land?—
—Great and increasing: but by sea
He is an absolute master. Shaks. Ant. and Cleop.

2. Unconditional; as an absolute promise.

Although it runs in forms absolute, yet it is indeed conditional, as depending upon the qualification of the person to whom it is pronounced. South, Serm.

3. Not relative; as, absolute space.

I see still the distinctions of sovereign and inferior, of absolute and relative worship, will bear any man out in the worship of any creature with respect to God, as well at least as it doth in the worship of images. Stillingfleet, Def. of Disc. on Rom. Idol.

An absolute mode is that which belongs to its subject, without respect to any other beings whatsoever: but a relative mode is derived from the regard that one being has to others. Watts, Logick.

In this sense we speak of the ablative case in absolute grammar.

4. Not limited; as, absolute power.

My crown is absolute, and holds of none;
I cannot in a base subjection live,
Nor suffer you to take, though I would give.

Dryden, Ind. Emp.

5. Positive; certain; without any hesitation. In this sense it rarely occurs.

Long is it since I saw him,
But time hath nothing blurr'd those lines of favour,
Which then he wore; the snatches in his voice,
And burst of speaking were as his: I'm absolute,
'Twas very Cloten. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

6. Absolute is by old writers used in the sense of newly shriven, omni peccato absolutus.

A'BSOLUTELY. adv. [from absolute.]

1. Completely, without restriction.

All the contradictions which grow in those minds, that neither absolutely climb the rock of virtue, nor freely sink into the sea of vanity. Sidney.

2. Without relation; in a state unconnected.

Absolutely we cannot discommend, we cannot absolutely approve either willingness to live, or forwardness to die. Hooker, b. v.

These then being the perpetual causes of zeal; the greatest good, or the greatest evil; either absolutely so in themselves, or relatively so to us; it is therefore good to be zealously affected for the one against the other. Sprat, Serm.

No sensible quality, as light and colour, and heat, and sound, can be subsistent in the bodies themselves, absolutely considered, without a relation to our eyes and ears, and other organs of sense. These qualities are only the effects of our sensation, which arise from the different motions, upon our nerves, from objects without, according to their various modifications and positions. Bentley, Serm.

3. Without limits or dependance.

The prince long time had courted fortune's love,
But, once possess'd, did absolutely reign:
Thus, with their Amazons, the heroes strove,
And conquer'd first those beauties they would gain.

Command me absolutely not to go,
Going into such danger, as thou saidst?

Milton, P. L. ix.

A'BSOLUTENESS.† n. s. [from absolute.]

1. Completeness; or, as Minsheu explains the word, perfection:

To the second part of the objection, the strength whereof is, that to tye up God in his actions to the reason of things, destroys his liberty, absoluteness, and independency; I answer, it is no imperfection for God to be determined to good; it is no bondage, slavery, or contraction, to be bound up to the eternal laws of right and justice.

Bp. Rust's Disc. of Truth, p. 189.

This should silence the proud regrets, and murmurings of our hearts, at the absoluteness of God's decrees and purposes: for why may not his decree be as absolute as his power?

South, Serm. viii. 241.

2. Freedom from dependance, or limits.

The absoluteness and illimitedness of his commission was generally much spoken of.

Clarendon, b. viii.

There is nothing that can raise a man to that generous absoluteness of condition, as neither to cringe, to fawn, or to depend meanly; but that which gives him that happiness within himself, for which men depend upon others. South, Serm.

3. Despotism.

He kept a strait hand on his nobility, and chose rather to advance clergymen and lawyers, which were more obsequious to him, but had less interest in the people; which made for his absoluteness, but not for his safety. Bacon, Hen. VII.

They dress up power with all the splendor and temptation absoluteness can add to it. Locke.

ABSOLU'TION.† n. s. [absolutio, Lat.]

1. Acquittal.

Absolution, in the civil law, imports a full acquittal of a person by some final sentence of law; also a temporary discharge of his farther attendance upon a mesne process, through a failure or defect in pleading; as it does likewise in the canon law, where, and among divines, it likewise signifies a relaxation of him from the obligation of some sentence pronounced either in a court of law, or else in foro pœnitentiali. Thus there is, in this kind of law, one kind of absolution, termed judicial, and another, stiled a declaratory or extrajudicial absolution. Ayliffe, Par. Juris Canonici.

2. The remission of sins, or penance, declared by ecclesiastical authority.

The absolution pronounced by a priest, whether papist or protestant, is not a certain infallible ground to give the person, so absolved, confidence towards God. South, Serm.

3. Delivery; pronunciation.

Some men are tall and big; so some language is high and great. Then the words are chosen, their sound ample, the composition full, the absolution plenteous, and poured out, all grave, sinewy, and strong. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

A'BSOLUTORY. adj. [absolutorius, Lat.] That absolves.

Though an absolutory sentence should be pronounced in favour of the persons, upon the account of nearness of blood; yet, if adultery shall afterwards be truly proved, he may be again proceeded against as an adulterer. Ayliffe, Parergon.

A'BSONANT.† adj. [See ABSONOUS.] Contrary to reason, wide from the purpose.

For Stoicism to rejoice at funerals, and lament at births of men, is more absonant to nature than reason. Quarles, Judg. & Mer. The Mourner.

A'BSONOUS.† adj. [absonus, Lat. Ill-sounding.]

1. Absurd, contrary to reason. Dr. Johnson says, it is not much in use; and it may be doubted whether it should be followed by to or from. He cites an instance from Glanville with to; which indeed I take to be the usual concomitant. But he has given no definition of a second sense, in which it is powerfully employed, and without any particle.

To suppose an uniter of a middle constitution, that should partake of some of the qualities of both, is unwarranted by any of our faculties; yea, most absonous to our reason.

Glanville, Scep. Scientifica, c. 4.

Parity of degrees in church-government, hath no foundation in holy Scripture, and is as absonous to reason as parity in a state or family.

Sir E. Dering's Speeches, p. 139.

2. Unmusical; Cockeram calls absonous also untunable.

That noise, as Macrobius truly inferreth, must be of necessity either sweet and melodious, or harsh and absonous. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 318.

To ABSO'RB. v. a. [absorbeo, Lat. preter. absorbed; part. pret. absorbed, or absorpt.]

1. To swallow up.

Some tokens shew
Of fearless friendship, and their sinking mates
Sustain; vain love, tho' laudable, absorpt
By a fierce eddy, they together found
The vast profundity. Philips.

2. To suck up. See ABSORBENT.

The evils that come of exercise are, that it doth absorb and attenuate the moisture of the body. Bacon.

Supposing the forementioned consumption should prove so durable as to absorb and extenuate the said sanguine parts to an extreme degree, it is evident, that the fundamental parts must necessarily come into danger. Harvey on Consumptions.

While we perspire, we absorb the outward air. Arbuthnot.

ABSO'RBENT. n. s. [absorbens, Lat.] A medicine that, by the softness or porosity of its parts, either causes the asperities of pungent humours, or dries away superfluous moisture in the body. Quincy.

There is a third class of substances, commonly called absorbents: as the various kinds of shells, coral, chalk, crabs eyes, &c. which likewise raise an effervescence with acids, and are therefore called alkalis, tho' not so properly, for they are not salts. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

ABSO'RBENT.* adj. That absorbs.

ABSORBI'TION.* n. s. [from asborb.] Absorption.

ABSO'RPT. part. [from absorb.] Swallowed up; used as well, in a figurative sense, of persons, as, in the primitive, of things.

What can you expect from a man who has not talked these five days? who is withdrawing his thoughts, as far as he can, from all the present world, its customs and its manners, to be fully possessed and absorpt in the past. Pope, Letters.

ABSO'RPTION.† n. s. [from absorb.]

1. The act of swallowing up.

It was below the dignity of those sacred penmen, or the Spirit of God that directed them, to shew us the causes of this disruption, or of this absorption; this is left to the enquiries of men. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

The aversion of God's face is confusion; the least bending of his brow is perdition; but his "totus æstus," his whole fury, is the utter absorption of the creature. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 24.

2. The state of being swallowed up.

This necessarily engages us in the history of the rise, progress, and decay of the ancient Greek philosophy: in which is shewn its original, like that of legislation, from Egypt: the several revolutions it underwent in its character, constantly attendant and conformable to the several revolutions of civil power: its gradual decay, and total absorption in the schools.

Warburton, Alliance Ch. and St. (1st. ed.) p. 165.

To ABSTA'IN. v. n. [abstineo, Lat.] To forbear, to deny one's self any gratification; with the particle from.

ABSTE'MIOUS. adj. [abstemius, Lat.] Temperate, sober, abstinent, refraining from excess or pleasures. It is used of persons; as, an abstemious hermit: and of things; as, an abstemious diet. It is spoken likewise of things that cause temperance.

The instances of longevity are chiefly amongst the abstemious. Abstinence in extremity will prove a mortal disease; but the experiments of it are very rare. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Clytorean streams the love of wine expel,
(Such is the virtue of the abstemious well)
Whether the colder nymph that rules the flood
Extinguishes, and balks the drunken god:
Or that Melampus (so have some assur'd)
When the mad Prætides with charms he cur'd,
And powerful herbs, both charms and simples cast
Into the sober spring, where still their virtues last.
Dryden, Fab.

ABSTE'MIOUSLY.† adv. [from abstemious.] Temperately, soberly, without indulgence.

The best expedient he [K. Charles I.] had to reconcile it, was to contract his diet to a few dishes out of the bill of fare, and to eat in private. And his eating being usually agreeable to his exercise, this abstemiousness was in no wise displeasing; his temperance preserving his health. Herbert's Memoirs.

ABSTE'NTION.† n. s. (from abstineo, Lat.] The act of holding off, or restraining; restraint.

The church superinduced times and manners of abstention, and expressions of sorrow.

ABSTE'RGENT. adj. Cleansing; having a cleansing quality.

To ABSTE'RSE. [See ABSTERGE.] To cleanse, to purify; a word very little in use, and less analogical than absterge.

Nor will we affirm, that iron receiveth, in the stomach of the ostrich, no alteration; but we suspect this effect rather from corrosion than digestion; not any tendence to chilification by the natural heat, but rather some attrition from an acid and vitriolous humidity in the stomach, which may absterse and shave the scorious parts thereof.

Brown, Vulg. Err. b. iii.

ABSTE'RSION. n. s. [abstersio, Lat.] The act of cleansing. See ABSTERGE.

Abstersion is plainly a scouring off, or incision of the more viscous humours, and making the humours more fluid, and cutting between them and the part; as is found in nitrous water, which scoureth linen cloth speedily from the foulness.

Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 42.

ABSTE'RSIVE.* n. s. [Fr. abstersif.] A cleanser.

Thy fav'rite flow'rs of yellow hue.
Swift, Miscellanies.

A'BSTINENCE. n. s. [abstinentia, Lat.]

1. Forbearance of any thing; with the participle from.

Because the abstinence from a present pleasure, that offers itself, is a pain, nay, oftentimes a very great one: it is no wonder that that operates after the same manner pain does, and lessens, in our thoughts, what is future; and so forces us, as it were, blindfold into its embraces. Locke.

2. Fasting, or forbearance of necessary food. It is generally distinguished from temperance, as the greater degree from the less; sometimes as single performances from habits; as, a day of abstinence, and a life of temperance.

Say, can you fast? your stomachs are too young:
And abstinence engenders maladies.
Shakspeare, Love's L. Lost.

And the faces of them, which have used abstinence, shall shine above the stars; whereas our faces shall be blacker than darkness.

To ABSTRA'CT.† v. a. [abstraho, Lat.] This word appears to have been objected against as a verb, by Fulke, in his remarks on the Rhemish testament, 1617; and it is explained as being then not intelligible to the generality of readers.

1. To take one thing from another.

Could we abstract from these pernicious effects, and suppose this were innocent, it would be too light to be matter of praise. Decay of Piety.

Mathematicks, in its latitude, is usually divided into pure and mixed. And though the pure do handle only abstract quantity in general, as geometry, arithmetic; yet that which is mixed, doth consider the quantity of some particular determinate subject. So astronomy handles the quantity of heavenly motions, music of sounds, and mechanics of weights and powers.

Wilkins, Mathem. Magick.

Abstract terms signify the mode or quality of a being, without any regard to the subject in which it is; as, whiteness, roundness, length, breadth, wisdom, mortality, life, death. Watts, Logick.

2. With the particle from.

Another fruit from the considering things in themselves, abstract from our opinions and other men's notions and discourses on them, will be, that each man will pursue his thoughts in that method, which will be most agreeable to the nature of the thing, and to his apprehension of what it suggests to him. Locke.

ABSTRA'CTEDLY.† adv. With abstraction, simply, separately from all contingent circumstances.

ABSTRA'CTEDNESS.* n. s. [from abstracted.] The state of being abstracted.

Men have added to the natural difficulty of this subject, by starting all manner of subtile and wire-drawn objections to hinder any conclusion from being established; and then they complain of the subtilty and abstractedness of the arguments; as if that were not occasioned by themselves.

Baxter, Enq. into the Nat. of the Soul, ii. 354.

If these latter prepositions, which supply the place of the cases, would be of such difficult invention on account of their abstractedness, some expedient to supply their place must have been of indispensable necessity.

In this science or mystery of words, a very judicious abstracter would find it a hard task to be any thing copious, without falling upon an infinite collection, &c. Mannyngham, Disc. p. 58.

ABSTRA'CTION.† n. s. [abstractio, Lat.]

1. The act of abstracting.

It is not oftentimes so much what the Scripture says, as what some men persuade others it says, that makes it seem obscure, and that as to some other passages that are so indeed, since it is the abstruseness of what is taught in them, that makes them almost inevitably so; it is little less saucy, upon such a score, to find fault with the style of the Scripture, than to do so with the authour for making us but men. Boyle on the Scripture.

2. The places where sciences are taught.

Amongst the academies, which were composed by the rare genius of those great men, these four are reckoned as the principal; namely, the Athenian school, that of Sicyon, that of Rhodes, and that of Corinth. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

Give me leave to complain: where can I do it better than at a court, the professed academy of honour? Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 45.

3. An university.

How much are all we bound, that are scholars, to those munificent Ptolemies, bountiful Mecænates, heroical patrons, divine spirits,—that have provided for us so many well-furnished libraries as well in our publick academies in most cities, as in our private colleges. How shall I remember Sir Thomas Bodley, &c. Burton, Anat. Mel. p. 278.

Some Jesuits, and two reverend men
Of our two academies I nam'd.
Donne, Poems, p. 130.

4. A place of education, in contradistinction to the universities or publick schools. The thing, and therefore the name is modern, Dr. Johnson says; but the name, in this sense, is old.

Affliction is a school or academy, wherein the best scholars are prepared, &c.
Burton, Anat. Mel. p. 717.

The first [request] is, that you would employ the utmost of this your power and interest, both with the king and parliament, to suppress and extinguish those private, blind, conventicling schools or academies of grammar and philosophy, set up and taught secretly by fanaticks, here and there all the kingdom over. South, Sermons, v. 45.

5. The academy; the school of philosophy.

Had the poor vulgar rout only, who were held under the prejudices and prepossessions of education, been abused into such idolatrous superstitions, as to adore a marble, or a golden deity, it might have been detested indeed, or pitied, but not so much to be wondered at: But for the Stoa, the Academy, or the Peripaton, to own such a paradox, — this (as the Apostle says) was without excuse. South, Sermons, ii. 245.

ACA'NTHUS. n.s. [Lat.] The name of the herb bears-breech, remarkable for being the model of the foliage on the Corinthian chapiter.

Whitlock on the Manners of the English, p. 222.

ACA'TER.* n.s. [See ACATES.] Provider or purchaser of provisions. Obsolete. In the dramatis personæ of B. Jonson's Sad Shepherd, we find "Robin Hood's bailiff or acater." Chaucer best defines the character.

A gentil manciple was ther of a temple,
Of which achatours might take ensemple,
For to ben wise in buying of vitaile.
Prologue, C. T.

ACA'TES.* n.s. [Old Fr. acat, achat, purchase; acheter, pronounced acater in Picardy and Languedoc, to purchase. Ital. accattare, to beg or borrow.] Provisions; victuals; viands; in more modern language, cates. This is a frequent word in our elder writers. Cotgrave, explaining the word pittance, says, that it meant "meat, food, acates, victual of all sort, bread and drink excepted." Chaucer uses the word in the singular number more than once; and defines coemption as "comen achate or buying together."

Transl. of Boeth. p. 362. col. 1.

The kitchen clerk, that hight Digestion,
Did order all th' acates in seemly wize.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. ix. 31.

Shelton's Tr. of D. Quix. B. 1. P. 4. ch. 23.

This obvious reflection convinced me of the absurdity of the treaty of Hanover in 1725, between France and England, to which the Dutch afterwards acceded. Chesterfield.

ACCELERA'TION.† n.s. [acceleratio, Lat.]

1. The act of quickening motion.

The law of the acceleration of falling bodies, discovered first by Galileo, is, that the velocities acquired by falling, being as the time in which the body falls, the spaces through which it passes, will be as the squares of the velocities, and the velocity and time taken together, as in a quadruplicate ratio of the spaces.

2. The state of the body accelerated, or quickened in its motion.

The degrees of acceleration of motion, the gravitation of the air, the existence or non-existence of empty spaces, either coacervate or interspersed, and many the like, have taken up the thoughts and times of men in disputes concerning them.
Hale, Origin of Mankind.

3. The act of hastening.

Hist.*

A'CCENT. n.s. [accentus, Lat.]

1. The manner of speaking or pronouncing, with regard either to force or elegance.

Your accent is something finer than you could purchase in so removed a dwelling.
Shakspeare, As you like it.

3. In grammar, the marks made upon syllables to regulate their pronunciation.

Holder.

4. Poetically, language or words.

1. To pronounce, to speak words with particular regard to the grammatical marks or rules.

Having got somebody to mark the last syllable but one, where it is long, in words above two syllables (which is enough to regulate her pronunciation, and accenting the words) let her read daily in the gospels, and avoid understanding them in Latin, if she can. Locke on Educat. § 177.

2. In poetry, to pronounce or utter in general.

O my unhappy lines! you that before
Have serv'd my youth to vent some wanton cries,

Wotton.

3. To write or note the accents.

To ACCE'PT.† v.a. [accipio, Lat. accepter, Fr.]

1. To take with pleasure; to receive kindly; to admit with approbation. It is distinguished from receive, as specifick from general; noting a particular manner of receiving.

Quix.* fol. 59. b.

ACCEPTABI'LITY. n.s. The quality of being acceptable. See ACCEPTABLE.

2. The meaning of a word as it is received or understood; acceptation is the word now commonly used.

That pleasure is man's chiefest good, because indeed it is the perception of good that is properly pleasure, is an assertion most certainly true, though, under the common acceptance of it, not only false but odious: for, according to this, pleasure and sensuality pass for terms equivalent; and therefore he, who takes it in this sense, alters the subject of the discourse. South.

1. The way by which any thing may be approached.
The access of the town was only by a neck of land. Bacon.

And here the unnavigable lake extends,
O'er whose unhappy waters, void of light,
No bird presumes to steer his airy flight.

2. The means or liberty of approaching either to things or men.
When we are wrong'd, and would unfold our griefs,
We are deny'd access unto his person,
Ev'n by those men that most have done us wrong.

And carry presents to procure access.

The reputation
Of virtuous actions past, if not kept up
With an access, and fresh supply of new ones,
Is lost and soon forgotten. Denham, Sophy.

4. It is sometimes used, Dr. Johnson says, after the French, to signify the returns or fits of a distemper; but that this sense seems yet scarcely received into our language; to which, however, I do not accede. In this sense it is a word frequently occurring in the works of the father of English poetry; and common in later authors. Mr. Boucher has also observed that the glossarists pronounce the word to be common in Lancashire, Northumberland, and Scotland, as denoting the ague. The French acces de fievre is also traced to the Latin. "Alii è tribus puteis pari mensurâ aquas miscent, et prolibant novo fictili: reliquum dant in tertianis accessu febrium bibendum." Plin. Nat. Hist. l. xxviii. c. 4. The Italians use accesso for a fit of an ague. See Florio's Dictionary.

More desperate than their first accesses. Hudibras.

ACCE'SSION.† n. s. [accessio, Lat. accession, Fr.]

A'CCESSORY. adj. Joined to another thing, so as to increase it; additional.
In this kind there is not the least action, but it doth somewhat make to the accessory augmentation of our bliss. Hooker.

And a man may be accessory to the offence of another, after two sorts, by the common law, or by statute: and, by the common law, two ways also; that is, before or after the fact. Before the fact; as, when one commandeth or adviseth another to commit a felony, and is not present at the execution thereof; for his presence makes him also a principal; wherefore there cannot be an accessory before the fact in manslaughter: because manslaughter is sudden and not prepensed. Accessory after the fact, is, when one receiveth him, whom he knoweth to have committed felony. Accessory by statute, is he that abets, counsels, or hides any man committing, or having committed an offence made felony by statute. Cowel.
By the common law, the accessories cannot be proceeded against, till the principal has received his trial. Spenser, State of Ireland.

It is, however, in use; and very justly, in the sense of consonant, or corresponding. The word, indeed, is properly the participle present of the verb accord; the termination of the present tense being formerly, after the Latin idiom, ant and and; as, glitterand, walkand, &c. It is found indeed in our oldest writers. "Take in remembrance a tale accordant unto this." Gower, Conf. Am. B. 6.

Our word, it has been observed, is now often written ake, and in the plural akes, of one syllable; the primitive manner being preserved chiefly in poetry, for the sake of the measure. If it were necessary, I could produce numerous examples of the dissyllabick pronunciation of áchés (the ch not being sounded as k,) which continued to be the plural of ache, certainly in verse, if not in prose, till the time of Swift; though there were not wanting editions of Johnson's Dictionary and of Swift's Works, in which the line, that is presently cited, is corrupted; and instead of "old áchés throb," we find "old akes will throb." Barret, one of our oldest lexicographers, distinguishes the verb and substantive, the former as ake; the latter ache. I am not contending for a revival of the distinction and different pronunciation; but I am shewing correctly what was long established usage.] A continued pain. See AKE.

Others will, upon account of the receivedness of the proposed opinion, think it rather worthy to be examined than acquiesced in. Boyle.

Neither a bare approbation of, nor a mere wishing, nor unactive complacency in; nor, lastly, a natural inclination to things virtuous and good, can pass before God for a man's willing of such things; and, consequently, if men, upon this account, will needs take up and acquiesce in an airy ungrounded persuasion, that they will those things which really they not will, they fall thereby into a gross and fatal delusion. South.

If the powers of cogitation and volition, and sensation, are neither inherent in matter as such, nor acquirable to matter by any motion or modification of it; it necessarily follows, that they proceed from some cogitative substance, some incorporeal inhabitant within us, which we call spirit and soul. Bentley.

Davies.

An eternal sterility must have possessed the world, where all things had been fixed and fastened everlastingly with the adamantine chains of specific gravity; if the Almighty had not spoken and said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after its kind; and it was so. Bentley.

In adamantine chains shall death be bound?
And hell's grim tyrant feel th' eternal wound.

ADAPTA'TION. n. s. [from adapt.] The act of fitting one thing to another; the fitness of one thing to another.

Some species there be of middle natures, that is, of bird and beast, as batts; yet are their parts so set together, that we cannot define the beginning or end of either, there being a commixtion of both, rather than adaptation or cement of the one unto the other. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Adhesion may be in part ascribed, either to some elastical motion in the pressed glass, or to the exquisite adaptation of the almost numberless, though very small, asperities of the one, and the numerous little cavities of the other; whereby the surfaces do lock in with one another, or are, as it were, clasped together. Boyle.

Of a lyon savage. Skelton, of Hercules, Poems, p. 51.

To ADA'W.* v. a. [Mr. Mason derives this word from the pretended Saxon aðpnan, with the explanation of extinguere; which, as Mr. Boucher has observed, is a word not in existence. Mr. Upton, observing that adaw is once used by Spenser for extinguish, (in the second instance here cited,) thinks that the poet might have had in view the Sax. ðþæꝛcan, aðþæꝛcan, extinguere. The word perhaps may be referred to the verb to awe, with the a prefixed, which is common, (as in the preceding word adaunt,) and the d inserted, to prevent an ill sound from the collision of two vowels. It is now obsolete.] To daunt; to keep under; to subject.

The sight thereof did greatly him adaw.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. vii. 13.

At nede, few frendes kinde. Gower, Conf. Am. b. 5.

2. To perform the mental operation of adding one number or conception to another. To add to is proper, but to add together seems a solecism.

A'DDABLE. adj. [from add.] To which something may be added. Addible is more proper. It signifies more properly what may be added.

A'DDICE. n.s. [for which we corruptly speak and write adz, from adeye, Sax. an axe.]

1. To devote, to dedicate, in a good sense; which is rarely used.

Ye know the house of Stephanus, that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints. 1 Cor. xvi. 15.

2. Dr. Johnson says, this word is commonly taken in a bad sense; as, he addicted himself to vice. This is so far from being the case, that some of our best writers abundantly use it in a good sense. One of our earliest lexicographers thus illustrates the verb addict, "To addict himself to live uprightly;" Barret's Alvearie; and under the adjective addict says, "Addict and given to the study of learning."

They did either earnestly lament and bewail their sinful lives, or did addict themselves to more fervent prayer. Homilies, ii. Of Fasting.

My grandfather Jesus, when he had much given himself to the reading of the law and the prophets, and other books of our fathers, and had gotten therein good judgement, was drawn on also himself to write something pertaining to learning and wisdom, to the intent that those which are desirous to learn, and addicted to these things, might profit much more in living according to the law. Prologue to Ecclesiasticus.

All knowledge, arising from observation, must be either of those sciences which immediately conduce to the benefit of men's lives, or such whose end is to improve men's rational faculties in the knowledge of things. The former, necessity will put men upon the finding out: the latter require "secessum et otia," freedom from other employments, a mind addicted to them, and industry in the study of them. Stillingfleet, Orig. Sac. ii. ii.

Many men, addicted rather to contemplation than action, in the infancy of Christianity, to avoid the heat of persecution, did withdraw themselves from the press of the people in populous cities to a more solitary life. Sir R. Twisden, Mon. Life, p. 3.

Whether if each of these towns were addicted to some peculiar manufacture, we should not find, that the employing many hands together on the same work was the way to perfect our workmen? Bp. Berkeley, Querist, 415.

The people of Ireland were much more addicted to pasturage than agriculture. Burke, Abr. Eng. Hist. iii. 6.

ADDI'CTION.† n.s. [addictio, Lat.]

1. The act of devoting, or giving up.

2. The state of being devoted.

It is a wonder how his grace should glean it,
Since his addiction was to courses vain;
His companies unletter'd, rude and shallow;
His hours fill'd up with riots, banquets, sports.

A'DDITAMENT. n.s. [additamentum, Lat.] The addition, or thing added.

ADDI'TION. n.s. [from add.]

ADDI'TIONAL. adj. [from addition.] That is added.

Our kalendar being once reformed and set right, it may be kept so, without any considerable variation, for many ages, by omitting one leap-year, i.e. the additional day, at the end of every 134 years. Holder on Time.

The greatest wits, that ever were produced in one age, lived together in so good an understanding, and celebrated one another with so much generosity, that each of them receives an additional lustre from his contemporaries. Addison.

They include in them that very kind of evidence, which is supposed to be powerful; and do, withal, afford us several other additional proofs of great force and clearness. Atterbury.

ADDI'TIONAL.† n.s. Additament; something added, which, however, Dr. Johnson says, is not in use; though good authors employ it.

May be, some little additional may further the incorporation. Bacon.

How much she [the church of Rome] hath in her superfluous additionals built upon good foundations, gold, silver, hay, stubble, and the like, is no where better distinguished than in what our church of England hath rejected, and in what she hath retained. Puller's Mod. of the Ch. of Eng. p. 452.

ADDI'TIONALLY.* adv. In addition.

Nor can any representation of God's proceedings be more harsh and incredible, than to suppose him, by his omnipotent will and power, eternally and miraculously preserving such creatures unto endless punishment, who never had in them either originally or additionally, any principle of immortality at all. Clerk, Letter to Dodwell.

The additory fiction gives to a great man a larger share of reputation than belongs to him, to enable him to serve some good end or purpose. Arbuthnot.

A'DDLE.† adj. [from adel, a disease, Sax. according to Skinner and Junius; perhaps from ydel, idle, barren, unfruitful. The latter of the preceding etymologies, which Dr. Johnson has given, may be rejected; but we may safely refer to the Sax. adel, morbus, a disease; or to the verb adlian, to be sick; or to the Brit. hadyl, corrupt, rotten; hadlu, to corrupt, to putrefy. Thus, Verstegan says, "we yet call eggs addle, when they are corrupt." Our old lexicographers, Huloet and Minsheu, call such an egg, ovum urinum; "quia aquam, habet urino in eo similem. Adla, in the Suio-Goth. language, is to make urine. Hence, perhaps, addle-pool. Addle, in the Lancashire dialect, is unfruitful.] Originally applied to eggs, and signifying such as produce nothing, but grow rotten under the hen; thence transferred to brains that produce nothing.

There's one with truncheon, like a ladle,
That carries eggs too fresh or addle;
And still at random, as he goes,
Among the rabble rout bestows. Hudibras.

To A'DDLE. v. a. [from addle, adj.] To make addle; to corrupt; to make barren.

This is also evidenced in eggs, whereof the sound ones sink, and such as are addled swim; as do also those that are termed hypanemiæ, or wind eggs. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To A'DDLE.† v. n. To grow, to encrease. [Dr. Johnson calls this word obsolete, which is not the fact. Mr. Boucher defines it "to earn by working," and considers it a Yorkshire, Staffordshire, Cumberland, and Cheshire word; derived from the Saxon æblean, or eblean, merces, retributio; whence also addlings, wages received for work. A gentleman has informed me, that in Nottinghamshire, and throughout the north, with some variation of sound, addle and addlings are now in use. He has also obligingly explained the word as used by Tusser, whom Dr. Johnson cites in the example of this verb: "Ivy will so embrace a tree as not only to prevent its increase, but to kill it. Tusser therefore advises to kill the ivy, or the tree will not addle, that is, will not earn or produce any profit to its owner." Mr. Wilbraham pronounces the word now common in Cheshire.]

Where ivy embraceth the tree very sore,
Kill ivy, else tree will addle no more.

Tusser's Husbandry.

That, as the wound, the passion might encrease.

Prior.

Most of the persons, to whom these addresses are made, are not wise and skilful judges, but are influenced by their own sinful appetites and passions. Watt's Improv. of the Mind.

4. Manner of addressing another; as, we say, a man of an happy or a pleasing address: a man of an aukward address.

5. Skill, dexterity.

I could produce innumerable instances from my own observation, of events imputed to the profound skill and address of a minister, which, in reality, were either mere effects of negligence, weakness, humour, passion, or pride, or, at best, but the natural course of things left to themselves.

Reid's Inquiry.

The learned and ingenious author of Hermes, with great strength of argument, shews, that language is founded in compact, and not in nature. His friend, Lord Monboddo, with great learning and ingenuity, supports the same opinion, and insists that language is not natural to man, but that it is acquired; and, in the course of his reflections, he adduces the opinions not only of heathen philosophers, poets, and historians, but of Christian divines, both ancient and modern.

Thou tread'st with seraphims, the vast abyss.

To ADU'LTER.† v. n. [adulterer, Fr. adultero, Lat. Dr. Johnson has improperly given this word as a verb active; which may be owing to the misapprehension of the passage by the person who made the citation from Ben Jonson, which in Johnson's dictionary is printed inaccurately, and of which (rightly given) the construction is, "Though Beast knows no more than his own wife, yet he is still committing adultery in thought."] To commit adultery with another: a word not classical.

To A'DVOCATE.* v. a. [Lat. advoco, Fr. avocasser.] To plead; to support; to defend.

Mr. Boucher has remarked, that though this verb has been said to be an improvement on the English language, which has been discovered by the United States of North America, since their separation from Great Britain, it is a very common and old Scottish word; which indeed it is both as an active and neuter verb. But Mr. Boucher has been misled in this literary concession which he has made to the Americans; for it is also an old English word, employed by one of our finest and most manly writers; and if the Americans affect to plume themselves on this pretended improvement of our language, let them as well as their abettors withdraw the unfounded claim to discovery, in turning to the prose-writings of Milton. In the dictionaries of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, however, as in the Latin of Thomas, the Spanish of Minsheu, the Italian of Florio, and the French of Cotgrave, advoco, advogar, avocare, and advocasser, are rendered not to advocate, but "to play the advocate."

Whether this reflect not with a contumely upon the parliament itself, which thought this petition worthy not only of receiving, but of voting to a commitment, after it had been advocated, and moved for by some honourable and learned gentlemen of the house to be called a combination of libelling separatists, and the advocates thereof to be branded for incendiaries; whether this appeach not the judgement and approbation of the parliament, I leave to equal arbiters.

1. He that pleads the cause of another in a court of judicature.
An advocate, in the general import of the word, is that person who has the pleading and management of a judicial cause. In a strict way of speaking, only that person is stiled advocate, who is the patron of the cause, and is often, in Latin, termed togatus, and, in English, a person of the long robe. Ayl. Par.
Learn what thou ow'st thy country and thy friend;

Except that we shall call you Orator Fly.
B. Jonson, New Inn, ii. 6.
2. The assistance or support of a great person in a suit, as Cotgrave further explains advocatie: and thus, in a higher sense.
This redargution of the world was made a part of the advocateship of the Holy Spirit by our Lord. "When he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, because they believe not on me."
Hallywell, Sav. of Souls, p. 71.

A'DVOCATESS.* n. s. A female advocate. The French have the feminine avocate, a mediatrix; and the Portuguese, avogada. Our elder synonimous but obsolete substantive is advocatrice, which is found in Sir T. Elyot's Governour.
He [the Archbishop of Florence] answers, That Christ is not our advocate alone, but a judge; and since the just is scarce secure, how shall a sinner go to him, as to an advocate? ADZ. n. s. See ADDICE.

AE, or Æ. A diphthong of very frequent use in the Latin language, which seems not properly to have any place in the English; since the æ of the Saxons has been long out of use, being changed to e simple, to which, in words frequently occuring, the æ of the Romans is, in the same manner, altered, as in equator, equinoctial, and even in Eneas.

ÆGIS.* n. s. [Lat. ægis.] A shield.

Æ'GLOGUE.† n. s. [written instead of eclogue, from a mistaken etymology.] A pastoral; a dialogue in verse between goat-herds.
Which moved him rathe in æglogues otherwise to write, doubting, perhaps, his ability, which he little needed, or minding to furnish our tongue with this kind wherein it faulteth.
Pref. to Spenser's Pastorals.
Petrarch entertained the learned men of his age with the novelty of modern pastorals in Latin. Being not ignorant of Greek, and finding nothing in the word "Eclogue" of rural meaning, he supposed it to be corrupted by the copiers, and therefore called his own productions Æglogues, by which he meant to express the talk of goatherds, though it will mean only the talk of goats. This new name was adopted by subsequent writers, and amongst others by our Spenser.
Johnson, Life of A. Philips.

To AFFRO'NT. v.a. [affronter, Fr. that is, adfrontem stare; ad frontem contumeliam allidere, to insult a man to his face.]
1. To meet face to face; to encounter. This seems the genuine and original sense of the word, which was formerly indifferent to good or ill.

3. To offer an open insult; to offend avowedly. With respect to this sense, it is observed by Cervantes, that, if a man strikes another on the back, and then runs away, the person so struck is injured, but not affronted; an affront always implying a justification of the act.

Yet sattest thou an idle looker on. Fairfax, i. 51.

8. In provision for; in expectation of.

This mode of speaking probably had its original from the idea of making provision against, or in opposition to a time of misfortune, but by degrees acquired a neutral sense. It sometimes has the case elliptically suppressed, as, against he comes, that is, against the time when he comes.

There are two excrescences which grow upon trees; both of them in the nature of mushrooms; the one the Romans call boletus, which groweth upon the roots of oaks, and was one of the dainties of their table; the other is medicinal, that is called agarick, which groweth upon the tops of oaks; though it be affirmed by some, that it groweth also at the roots. Bacon.

AGA'ST.† adj. [This word, which is usually, by later authours, written aghast, is, not improbably, the true word derived from agaze, which has been written aghast, from a mistaken etymology. See AGHAST. We have also, in our old language, agasted.] Struck with terrour; amazed; frighted to astonishment.

Thus roving on
In confus'd march forlorn, th' advent'rous bands,
With shudd'ring horrour pale, and eyes agast,
View'd first their lamentable lot, and found

The verb is now out of use, Dr. Johnson says; but he has omitted to notice that the verb agast occurs in Chaucer, who also uses the preter agast as Spenser here does aghast (for he spells it with the h), for agasted.

So as they travelled, so they gan espy
An armed knight towards them gallop fast,
That seemed from some feared foe to fly,

AGA'ZED. particip. adj. [from agaze.] Struck with amazement; terrified to stupidity.

Hundreds he sent to hell, and none durst stand him;

AGE.† n. s. [age, Fr. antiently eage, or aage; it is deduced by Menage, from ætatium, of ætas; by Junius, from aa, which, in the Teutonick dialects, signified long duration. Dr. Johnson. — See also Loescheri Literator Celta, p. 67. "Agu Gothis ætatem notabat, quod convenit cum Anglo-Saxonico age, et Franco-Gallico aage, ejusdem significationis vocibus."]

1. Any period of time attributed to something as the whole, or part, of its duration; in this sense, we say, the age of man, the several ages of the world, the golden or iron age.

One man in his time plays many parts,
His life being seven ages. Shakpeare.

And Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years; so the whole age of Jacob was an hundred forty and seven years. Gen. xlvii. 28.

2. A succession or generation of men.

Hence, lastly, springs care of posterities,
For things their kind would everlasting make.
Hence is it, that old men do plant young trees,
The fruit whereof another age shall take.
Sir J. Davies.

Next, to the Son,
Destin'd Restorer of mankind, by whom
New heav'n, and earth, shall to the ages rise,
Or down from heav'n descend. Milton, P. L.

No declining age
E'er felt the raptures of poetic rage. Roscommon.

3. The time in which any particular man, or race of men, lived, or shall live; as, the age of heroes.

No longer now the golden age appears
When patriarch wits surviv'd a thousand years.
Pope.

4. The space of a hundred years; a secular period; a century.

5. The latter part of life; old-age; oldness.

You see how full of change his age is: the observation we have made of it hath not been little; he always loved our sister most, and with what poor judgment he hath now cast her off.
Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Boys must not have th' ambitious care of men,
Nor men the weak anxieties of age. Roscommon.

And on this forehead, where your verse has said,
The loves delighted, and the graces play'd;
Insulting age will trace his cruel way,
And leave sad marks of his destructive sway. Prior.

6. Maturity; ripeness; years of discretion; full strength of life.

A solemn admission of proselytes, all that either, being of age, desire that admission for themselves, or that, in infancy, are by others presented to that charity of the church. Hammond.

We thought our sires, not with their own content,
Had, ere we came to age, our portion spent.
Dryden.

7. In law.

In a man, the age of fourteen years is the age of discretion; and twenty-one years is the full age: In a woman, at seven years of age, the lord her father may distrain his tenants for aid to marry her; at the age of nine years, she is dowable; at twelve years, she is able finally to ratify and confirm her former consent given to matrimony; at fourteen, she is enabled to receive her land into her own hands, and shall be out of ward at the death of her ancestor: at sixteen, she shall be out of ward, though, at the death of her ancestor, she was within the age of fourteen years; at twenty-one, she is able to alienate her lands and tenements. At the age of fourteen, a stripling is enabled to choose his own guardian; at the age of fourteen, a man may consent to marriage. Cowell.

A'GED. adj. [from age. It makes two syllables in poetry.]

1. Old; stricken in years; applied generally to animate beings.

If the comparison do stand between man and man, the aged, for the most part, are best experienced, least subject to rash and unadvised passions.
Hooker.

Novelty is only in request; and it is as dangerous to be aged in any kind of course, as it is virtuous to be constant in any undertaking.
Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

Kindness itself too weak a charm will prove,
To raise the feeble fires of aged love. Prior.

2. Old; applied to inanimate things. This use is rare, and commonly with some tendency to the prosopopœia.

The people did not more worship the images of gold and ivory, than they did the groves; and the same Quintilian faith of the aged oaks.
Stillingfleet's Defence of Disc. on Rom. Idol.

A'GEDLY.† adv. [from aged.] After the manner of an aged person. Dr. Johnson has thus given the adverb, without reference to any dictionary. It occurs in the early one of Huloet, where it is also defined vetuste, anciently.

AGE'N. adv. [Sax. agen.] Again; in return. See AGAIN. Dr. Johnson asserts that this word is written agen only for the sake of the rhyme, (though it be in reality the true orthography), which is a great mistake; for it is repeatedly used by Milton without any such necessity; as, in Comus: "Heaven keep my sister! Agen, agen, and near!" C. Boyle, in his Dissertation on Phalaris, writes the word agen, as in pages 21. and 289. And so Bishop Smalridge, in his Sermons, p. 67. This indeed is conforming to the true etymology. Mr. Nares, in his Elements of Orthoepy, says that Dryden always writes again. I believe not: for in his Palamon and Arcite we read:

Borne far asunder by the tides of men,
Like adamant and steel they meet agen.

And in his translation of Ovid:

He [Polyphemus] weary sought agen
The cool retirement of his gloomy den.
Pol. and Gal. ver. 46.

This success is oft truly ascribed unto the force of imagination upon the body agent; and then, by a secondary means, it may upon a diverse body; as, for example, if a man carry a ring, or some part of a beast, believing strongly that it will help him to obtain his love, it may make him more industrious, and again more confident and persisting than otherwise he would be. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

It is a word almost appropriated to medicine, Dr. Johnson says; but it was not so in elder times; for Cotgrave renders the French verb, "to fasten together with glew."

The body has got room enough to grow into its full dimensions, which is performed by the daily ingestion of food that is digested into blood; which being diffused through the body, is agglutinated to those parts that were immediately agglutinated to the foundation parts of the womb.

Boswell, Tour to the Hebrides, p. 133.

AGGRA'NDIZEMENT.† n. s. [aggrandissement, Fr.] The state of being aggrandized; the act of aggrandizing. The accent seems to fall, with greater propriety, on the second syllable of this word, as in aggrandization; though Dr. Johnson has chosen to adopt the first.

We may date from the treaty of Munster, the decline of the House of Austria, the great power of the House of Bourbon, and the aggrandizement of the House of Brandenburgh.

Ld. Chesterfield.

In the midst of this chaos there were principles at work, which reduced things to a certain form, and gradually unfolded a system in which the chief movers and main springs were the papal and the imperial powers; the aggrandizement or diminution of which have been the drift of almost all the politicks, intrigues, and wars, which have employed and distracted Europe to this day.

In a letter to her majesty, I conclude with a supplication, that she will be pleased to receive a page, at the joint suit of the house of Bacon's; a boy of singular spirits, without aggravation of her charge; for he shall want no means to entertain himself in good fashion about so royal a mistress.

Sir H. Wotton, Rem. p. 560.

2. The act of enlarging to enormity.

A painter added a pair of whiskers to the face, and by a little aggravation of the features changed it into the Saracen's head. Addison.

The easier towards me, or thy hatred less. Milton.

A'GGREGATE. adj. [aggregatus, Lat.] Framed by the collection of any particular parts into one mass, body, or system.

A'GGREGATE. n. s. [from the verb.] The complex, or collective result of the conjunction or acervation of many particulars.

The reason of the far greatest part of mankind, is but an aggregate of mistaken phantasms, and, in things not sensible, a constant delusion. Glanville, Scepsis Scientifica.

A great number of living and thinking particles could not possibly, by their mutual contract, and pressing, and striking, compose one greater individual animal, with one mind and understanding, and a vital consension of the whole body; any more than a swarm of bees, or a crowd of men and women, can be conceived to make up one particular living creature, compounded and constituted of the aggregate of them all. Bentley.

To AGGRI'EVE.† v. a. [old Fr. agrever.]

1. To give sorrow; to cause grief; to vex. It is not improbable, that to grieve was originally neuter, and aggrieve the active, Dr. Johnson says; but aggrieve is also neuter.

But while therein I took my chief delight,
I saw, alas! the gaping earth devour
The spring, the place, and all clean out of sight:
Which yet aggrieves my heart even to this hour. Spenser.

It is generally applied to the external appearance.

She sighing sore, as if her heart in twaine
Had riven been, and all her heart-strings brast, aghast. Spenser.

Their function is termed agistment; as, agistment upon the sea banks. This word agist is also used, for the taking in of other men's cattle into any man's ground, at a certain rate per week. Blount.

AGI'STMENT.† n. s. [See AGIST. It is taken by the canon lawyers in another sense than is mentioned under agist. They seem to intend by it, a modus or composition, or mean rate, at which some right or due may be reckoned: perhaps it is corrupted from addoucissement, or adjustment.]

1. The feeding of cattle in a common pasture, for a stipulated price.

If a man takes in a horse or other cattle to graze and depasture his grounds, which the law calls agistment, he takes them upon an implied contract to return them safe to the owner. Blackstone.

2. Tithe due for the profit made by agisting or feeding of unprofitable cattle, as neither the ground nor the cattle can in any other way pay any thing for an acknowledged receipt of profit from titheable articles.

3. An embankment; earth heaped up. Such fences the inhabitants of marshy countries are bound to keep up, as Mr. Boucher has shewn from the charter of Romney-marsh. This leads him to propose the etymology of agger and aggestus, especially also as in old writings agistment is written aggestamentum or aggestiamentum.

AGI'STOR.† n. s. [from agist.] An officer of the king's forest. See AGIST.

The fairest day is seldom without a cloud, for at this time some active and malevolent persons of the army, disguised under the specious name of agitators, being two selected out of every regiment to meet and debate the concerns of the army, met frequently at Putney. Sir T. Herbert's Memoirs.

Some for the Rump, and some more crafty
For agitators, and the safety. Butler, Hudibras, iii. 2.

2. He who manages affairs.

He must be very ignorant of the state of every popular interest, who does not know that in all the corporations, all the open boroughs, indeed in every district in the kingdom, there is some leading man, some agitator, some wealthy merchant, or considerable manufacturer, some active attorney, some popular preacher, some money-lender, &c. who is followed by the whole flock. Burke's Speech on the Duration of Parliaments.

A'GNATE.* adj. [Lat. agnatus.] In our old dictionaries it is a substantive, and called "a kinsman by the father's side;" and is an authorized substantive in Scotland. In modern times, it has been applied as an adjective, in the sense of "allied to; akin." See AGNATION.

AGNA'TICK.* adj. [from agnate.] Relating to kindred by descent from the father.

This I take to be the true reason of the constant preference of the agnatick succession, or issue derived from the male ancestors, through all the stages of collateral inheritance; as the ability for personal service was the reason for preferring the males at first in the direct lineal succession. Blackstone, Law of Descents.

AGNA'TION.† n. s. [from agnatus, Lat.]

1. Descent from the same father, in a direct male line, distinct from cognation, or consanguinity, which includes descendants from females.

2. Alliance; connection.

By an attentive examination of the peculiarities in enunciation which each people have, in the one way or the other, by a fair reciprocal analysis of the agnate words they reciprocally use, I think a much greater agnation may be found amongst all the languages in the northern hemisphere of our globe. Pownall on the Study of Antiquities, p. 168.

AGNI'TION.† n. s. [from agnitio, Lat.] Acknowledgement.

It must needs be proper to begin the confession of our faith with the agnition of our God. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 1.

To AGNI'ZE.† v. a. [Fr. agniser.] To acknowledge; to own; to avow. This word is now obsolete, Dr. Johnson says; but it was not out of use, when his dictionary was published.

I do agnize
A natural and prompt alacrity
I find in hardness. Shakspeare, Othello.

An elicite act of worship, is an act which hath

In evil times, undaunted, though alone,

The British continueth yet in Wales, and some villages of Cornwall, intermingled with provincial Latin, being very significative, copious, and pleasantly running upon agnominations, although harsh in aspirations. Camden.

White is there usurpt for her brow; her forehead; and then sleek, as the parallel to smooth, that went before. A kind of paranomasie, or agnomination: do you conceive, Sir?
B. Jonson, Poetaster, iii. 1.

Our bards hold agnominations, and enforcing of consonant words or syllables one upon the other, to be the greatest elegance: As for example, in Welsh, Tewgeis, todyrris, ty'r derryn, gwillt, &c. So have I seen divers old rhymes in Italian running so: Donne, O danno, che Felo affronto affronta: In selva salvo a me: Piu caro cuore, &c.
Howell's Letters, i. 1. 40.

*A'GNUS. n. s. [Lat.] In the Romish church, a little image, representing our Saviour in the figure of a lamb.

Brevint's Saul and Samuel at Endor, p. 331.

We all know how far it is easier for men and women of loose lives to amuse themselves with scapularies, beads, ropes, agnusses, and sprinkling their bodies with holy water, than to lift up pure hearts to God. Ibid. p. 322.

A'GNUS CASTUS. n. s. [Lat.] The name of the tree commonly called the Chaste Tree, from an imaginary virtue of preserving chastity.

Of laurel some, of woodbine many more,
And wreathes of agnus castus others bore.
Dryden, Flower and Leaf.

AGO'. adv. [aȝan, Sax. past or gone; whence writers formerly used, and in some provinces the people still use, agone for ago.] Past; as long ago; that is, long time has past since. Reckoning time towards the present, we use since; as, it is a year since it happened: reckoning from the present, we use ago; as, it happened a year ago. This is not, perhaps, always observed.

The great supply,
Are wreck'd three nights ago on Godwin sands.
Shakspeare.

This both by others and myself I know,
For I have serv'd their sovereign long ago;
Oft have been caught within the winding train.

Addison, Freeholder.

AGO'G.† adv. [a word of uncertain etymology; the French have the term à gogo, in low language; as ils vivent à gogo, they live to their wish: from this phrase our word may be, perhaps, derived. This is Dr. Johnson's etymological description; which is unsatisfactory. Mr. Boucher has bestowed much pains in attempting to trace the word, in the sense of elate, to the Hebrow gag, signifying the roof or most eminent part of a building; and to gok, used by the Norwegians to look high; and to gove, meaning in the north of Scotland to look about one; not forgetting also goggles, a species of spectacles, and goggle eyes; and finally to the Bas Bret. gaug, (pronounced like gog,) a hill. This last he would resolve into a-gaug, i. e. on high, and thence elicit the figurative agog, i. e. elate. But the word perhaps is nothing more than a corruption of the Goth. gagg, the road, the way, from gaggan, to go; whence the Saxon ȝanȝan, to go. Mr. Tooke, in the margin of his Johnson, has marked the Saxon word. I think, therefore, that agog means no more than agoing, in a hurry to seize an object, or accomplish a design. In the Yorkshire dialect, "to set one agog," is to make one long or desire. So in this sense we have, in our elder language, the substantive gog for haste or desire. "You have put me into such a gog of going, I would not stay for all the world." Beaum. & Fl. Wit without Money, iii. 1.]

1. In a state of desire; in a state of warm imagination; heated with the notion of some enjoyment; longing; strongly excited.

As for the sense and reason of it, that has little or nothing to do here; only let it sound full and round, and chime right to the humour, which is at present agog (just as a big, long, rattling name is said to command even adoration from a Spaniard), and, no doubt, with this powerful, senseless engine, the rabble-driver shall be able to carry all before him. South, Serm.

2. It is used with the verbs to be, or to set; as, he is agog, or you may set him agog.

The gawdy gossip, when she's set agog,
In jewels drest, and at each ear a bob,
Goes flaunting out, and, in her trim of pride,
Thinks all she says or does, is justify'd.
Dryden, Juv. Sat. 6.

This maggot has no sooner set him agog, but he gets him a ship, freights her, builds castles in the air, and conceits both the Indies in his coffers.
L'Estrange.

3. It has the particles on, or for, before the object of desire.

On which the saints are all agog,
And all this for a bear and dog. Hudibras, cant. ii.

Gypsies generally straggle into these parts, and set the heads of our servant-maids so agog for husbands, that we do not expect to have any business done as it should be, whilst they are in the country.
Addison, Spectator.

AGO'ING.† particip. adj. [from a and going.] In action; into action.

In later times, it has been used in allusion to the original meaning.

To AGRE'ASE.† [What has been said respecting this pretended verb, is an oversight of Dr. Johnson, occasioned by his slight attention both to Spenser's own reading, and to the sense of the passage. See AGRISE. There is no such verb in Spenser as agrease; which, however, Dr. Johnson has asserted; defining it, from a and grease, to daub, &c. Dr. Ash has adopted the error. But this is not the only example, as I shall have occasion to shew, of non-existent words produced with the venerable air of authority, and consequently of etymology and definition, however ingenious, misapplied.]

To AGRI'SE.† v. n. [aȝpiꝑan, Sax.] To look terrible, Dr. Johnson says; and adds that it is out of use, citing only the name of Spenser. Neither as a verb neuter, nor in such sense, is the word found in that poet. In Chaucer, however, this verb occurs, but not in that sense. It is there equivalent to the Latin horresco, to begin to shiver for fear, or through pity or abhorrence; as we now say, "it made one shudder to hear it."

The kinges herte of pitee gan agrise,
Whan he saw so benigne a creature
Fall in disese and in misaventure.

Yet not the colour of the troubled deep,

A'GUE.† n. s. [Goth. agis, terror. This etymology is given by Mr. Horne Tooke, to use his own words, as, "the long-sought etymology of our English word ague;" and is highly commended, on account of the reasons by which Mr. Tooke ingeniously supports it, by Mr. Boucher; viz. 1. Because the Anglo-Saxons and English, in their adoption of the Gothick substantives, (most of which terminate in s,) always drop the terminating s. 2. Because, though the English word is written ague, the common people and the country people always pronounce it aghy, or aguy. 3. Because the distinguishing mark of this complaint is the trembling or shuddering; and from that distinguishing circumstance it would naturally take its name. 4. Because the French, from whom the term aigu is supposed to have been borrowed, never called the complaint by that name. Diversions of Purley, vol. i. p. 462. Aigu, Fr. acute, is the etymology adopted by Johnson; but the Gothick word, denoting fear or trembling, had been considered the parent of our English expression long before the existence of Mr. Tooke's remarks on our language. See the Eng. and Swedish Dict. of Serenius, 2d edit. 1757, under the word AGUE, viz. "M. Goth. AGIS, terror," &c.] An intermitting fever, with cold fits succeeded by hot. A'IRPOISE.* n. s. An instrument to measure the weight of the air.

Mr. Hooke had read in the minutes of the last meeting, that he had contrived a barometer, by which an infinite number of small mutations of the air might be discovered, which would be wholly invisible and insensible by the more common airpoises. Hist. Royal Soc. iii. 363.

A'IRPUMP. n. s. [from air and pump.]

A machine by whose means the air is exhausted out of proper vessels. The principle on which it is built, is the elasticity of the air; as that on which the waterpump is founded, is on the gravity of the air. The invention of this curious instrument is ascribed to Otto de Guerick, consul of Magdebourg, in 1654. But his machine laboured under several defects, the force necessary to work it was very great, and the progress very slow; it was to be kept under water, and allowed of no change of subjects for experiments. Mr. Boyle, with the assistance of Dr. Hooke, removed several inconveniencies; though, still, the working was laborious, by reason of the pressure of the atmosphere at every exsuction. This labour has been since removed by Mr. Hawksbee, who, by adding a second barrel and piston, to rise as the other fell, and fall as it rose, made the pressure of the atmosphere on the descending one, of as much service as it was of disservice in the ascending one. Vream made a further improvement, by reducing the alternate motion of the hand and winch to a circular one. Chambers.

The air that, in exhausted receivers of airpumps, is exhaled from minerals, and flesh, and fruits, and liquors, is as true and genuine as to elasticity and density, or rarefaction, as that we respire in; and yet this factitious air is so far from being fit to be breathed in, that it kills animals in a moment, even sooner than the absence of air, or a vacuum itself.
Bentley.

A'IRSHAFT. n. s. [from air and shaft] A passage for the air into mines and subterraneous places.

By the sinking of an airshaft, the air hath liberty to circulate, and carry out the steams both of the miners breath and the damps, which would otherwise stagnate there. Ray.

A'IR-THREATENING.* adj. [from air and threaten. A fine compound, and well adapted in the following ancient description.] Threatening the air.

The leaves that whilom were so fresh and green,
In healthless autumn to the ground do fall,
And others in their rooms at spring are seen:
So proudest states, amongst the states of men,
Now mount the lofty top of fortune's wheel,
Now fall again, now firmly stand, now reel.
Mir. for Mag. p. 563.

A'IRY. adj. [from air; aëreus., Lat.]

AISLE.† n. s. [Thus the word is written by Addison, but perhaps improperly; since it seems deducible only from either aile, a wing, or allée, a path, and is therefore to be written aile, Dr. Johnson says; but perhaps Addison had in mind the Latin ascellæ, used for alæ. V. Du Cange.] The walks in a church, or wings of a quire.

The abbey is by no means so magnificent as one would expect from its endowments. The church is one huge nef, with a double aisle to it; and, at each end, is a large quire. Addison.

There are also alæ ecclesiarum, which we meet with in Church-writers; as we corruptly call them the isles of churches, &c. Abp. Sancroft, Serm. p. 152.

The Latin Church called them ailæ, wings; thence the French, les ailes; and we more corruptly, iles; from their resemblance of the church to a dove.

Ere long-wish'd night brings necessary rest. Prior.

2. It is frequently applied, in an improper sense, to the heart; as, the heart akes; to imply grief or fear. Shakspeare has used it, still more licentiously, of the soul.

My soul akes
To know when two authorities are up,
Neither supreme, how soon confusion
May enter. Shakspeare, Coriol.

If this would satisfy the conscience, we might not only take the present covenant, but subscribe to the council of Trent; yea, and to the Turkish alcoran; and swear to maintain and defend either of them. Saunderson against the Cov.

Dryden furnishes an example of the present accentuation of this word. But in our elder poetry the accent is on both the first and second syllables.

In virtue of his holier álcoran.

For by the holy álcoran I swear.

I have called the alcoranish Arabick a hodgepodge or jumble of several corrupt dialects of the Hebrew. Parkhurst, Heb. Lex. Pref.

ALC'OVE.† n. s. [alcoba, Span. alkove, Dan. But originally from the Arab. alkobba. V. Dict. de la Lengua Castellana, por la R. Acad. Espan. And Bp. The wood is used by turners, and will endure ong under ground, or in water. Millar.

Without the grot, a various sylvan scene
Appear'd around, and groves of living green;
Poplars and alders ever quivering play'd,
And nodding cypress form'd a fragant shade.
Pope, Odyss.

ALDERLI'EVEST.† adj. superl. [from alder, of all; correspondent with ealpa the gen. plural of eal, Sax. all; and often formerly used in composition with adjectives of the superlative degree, as alderbest, alderlest, Prompt. Parv. alderworst, Gower; and lieve, dear, beloved.] Most beloved; most dear.

2. The society of aldermen.

Thou [London] canst draw forth thy forces, and fight dry
The battles of thy aldermanity;
Without the hazard of a drop of blood,
More than the surfeits in thee that day stood.
Underwoods, Speech acc. to Horace.

A'LDERMANLIKE.* adj. In the manner of an alderman.

Last of all came the curate and barber upon their mighty mules, and with their faces covered, all in a grave posture, and with an aldermanlike pace, travelling no faster than the slow steps of the heavy oxen permitted them.

And all the neighbourhood from old records

With country precedents, and old wives tales,
We bring you now. B. Jonson.

A'LE-BENCH.* n. s. ["Good ale never wanted a friend upon the bench." Dr. J. White's Sermon at Paul's Cross (1615), p. 25.] A bench in or before an ale-house.

Too many there be, which upon the ale-benches or other places, delight to set forth certain questions, not so much pertaining to edification as to vain-glory and shewing forth of their cunning; and so unsoberly to reason and dispute, that when neither part will give place to other, they fall to chiding and contention, and sometimes from hot words to further inconvenience.
Homilies, b. 1. Against Contention.

Sit on their ale-bench with their cups and cans.

A'LE-CONNER.† n. s. [from ale and con.] An officer in the city of London, whose business it is to inspect the measures of publick houses. Four of them are chosen or rechosen annually by the common-hall of the city; and whatever might be their use formerly, their places are now regarded only as sinecures for decayed citizens.

Such inspectors of the quality as well as quantity of ale, are not confined to the city of London, as Dr. Johnson would insinuate in the preceding paragraph, but are still in existence in Cheshire, who are appointed at the lord's court-leet, and possess the privilege of tasting or drinking a limited measure at every publick house, at certain times in the year.

Headboroughs, tithingmen, aleconners, and sidesmen are appointed, in the oaths incident to their offices, to be likewise charged to present the offences [of drunkenness.]

To ALE'GGE.* v. a. [Old Fr. alleger, aleger, to ease or alleviate.] To lessen; to assuage. Dr. Johnson has given this obsolete word (and with a mistaken etymology) as the pretended verb aligge, which Mr. Mason positively asserts to be in the passage cited from Spenser, though probably an errour of the press, or an intended countrified accent for alegge. The fact is, neither Dr. Johnson nor Mr. Mason have attended to the true reading of the poet, which in the genuine editions is alegge, and not aligge. Spenser also writes allegge; but not alledge, which is the reading of a bad edition, and has misled Mr. Boucher. Spenser copies Chaucer in the usage of this old word, and uses also the substantive alleggeaunce.

The joyous time now nigheth fast,
That shall allegge this bitter blast,
And slake the winter sorrow. Past. March.

A'LEHOOF. n. s. [from ale and hoof, head.] Ground-ivy, so called by our Saxon ancestors, as being their chief ingredient in ale. An herb.

A'LEHOUSE.† n. s. [Sax. ealhur.] A house where ale is publickly sold; a tipling house. It is distinguished from a tavern, where they sell wine.

Thou, most beauteous inn,
Why should hard-favoured grief be lodg'd in thee,
When triumph is become an alehouse guest? Shaks.

One would think it should be no easy matter to bring any man of sense in love with an alehouse; indeed of so much sense, as seeing and smelling amounts to; there being such strong encounters of both, as would quickly send him packing, did not the love of good fellowship reconcile to these nuisances. South.

Thee shall each alehouse, thee each gilhouse mourn,
And answ'ring ginshops sowrer sighs return. Pope.

A'LEHOUSE-KEEPER. n. s. [from alehouse and keeper.] He that keeps ale publickly to sell.

You resemble perfectly the two ale-housekeepers in Holland, who were at the same time burgomasters of the town, and taxed one another's bills alternately. Letter to Swift.

A'LEKNIGHT. n. s. [from ale and knight.] A pot-companion; a tipler: a word now out of use.

cover has a beak or spout, into which the vapours rise, and by which they pass into a serpentine pipe, which is kept cool by making many convolutions in a tub of water; here the vapours are condensed, and what entered the pipe in fumes, comes out in drops.

Though water may be rarefied into invisible vapours, yet it is not changed into air, but only scattered into minute parts; which meeting together in the alembeck, or in the receiver, do presently return into such water as they constituted before. Boyle.

ALE'NGTH.† adv. [from a for at, and length.] At full length; along; stretched along the ground. Anciently written on length.

These wordes said, she streyght her on length, and rested awhile. Chaucer, Test. of Love.

ALE'RT.† adj. [Fr. alerte, perhaps from alacris, but probably from à l'art, according to art or rule, Dr. Johnson says. But, in these etymologies, he is not successful. — The word seems to be of military origin; and though it is supposed by Major James, in his Military Dictionary, to be "formed of the "French a and airte, the French for- "merly writing airte for air, so that "alerte means something continually in "the air, and always ready to be put in "motion;" the word, I say, is not derived from such a strange combination, but from the military language, both of the French and Italian. "Estre à l'erte, to observe or watch from a high place, to lie in wait," Cotgrave's Fr. and Eng. Dict. 1632. in V. erte, a watch-tower, "Stare al'erta, to be watchful," Florio's Ital. Dict. 1598. Hence the Spanish phrase, "alérta," ready prepared, put in order, Minsheu's Span. Dict. 1599. Mr. Tooke, who has traced the etymology to the Italian phrase all'erta, which he refers ultimately to the Latin erigere, without noticing the existence of the phrases in the dictionaries which I have named, or knowing that the word was in use among us as a military word early in the 17th century, is angry with Dr. Johnson for saying that alert has a contemptuous meaning also, which it certainly has, and which is not disproved by Mr. Tooke's production of the French phrase, à l'herte, meaning in an erect posture.]

1. In the military sense, on guard; watchful; vigilant; ready at a call.

In this place the prince, finding his rutters alert, (as the Italians say,) with advice of his valiant brother, he sent his trumpets to the Duke of Alva, &c. Sir Roger Williams, Act. of the Low Count. 1618. p. 27.

He was always alert and attentive to the claims of friendship and benevolence. Graves's Recoll. of Shenstone, p. 156.

2. In the common sense, brisk; pert; petulant; smart; implying some degree of censure and contempt.

I saw an alert young fellow, that cocked his hat upon a friend of his, and accosted him: Well, Jack, the old prig is dead at last. Addison Spectator.

Why how now, Doll Diamond, you're very alert; Is it your French breeding has made you so pert? Swift, Verses edited by Dr. Barret, p. 96.

ALE'RTNESS. n. s. [from alert.] The quality of being alert; sprightliness; pertness.

That alertness and unconcern for matters of common life, a campaign or two would infallibly have given him. Addison, Spectator.

ALE-STAKE.* n. s. [from ale and stake.] A stake set up before an ale-house, by way of sign. Some have mistaken the meaning of this word, and called it a may-pole, as if the ale-stake never was adorned with garlands. Originally, a bush, perhaps of ivy, was the thing chosen for the sign. Skelton calls it an ale-pole.

A gerland had he sette upon his hede,
As gret as [if] it were for an ale-stake.
Chaucer, Prol. Canterb. Tales.

Like a true ale-stake, he tells you where the best ale is. Comment on the Miller's Tale, &c. p. 3.

A'LETASTER. n. s. [from ale and taster.] An officer appointed in every courtleet, and sworn to look to the assize and the goodness of bread and ale, or beer, within the precincts of that lordship. Cowel.

A'LEVAT. n. s. [from ale and vat.] The tub in which the ale is fermented.

ALE'W.* n. s. Shouting, or crying aloud, of which last word Mr. Boucher supposes it a variety or corruption; and considers it the same word as what since Spenser's time has been, and still is, written halloo.

Yet did she not lament with loud alew,
As women wont, but with deepe sighes and singulfes few. Spenser, F. Q. v. vi. 13.

A'LEWASHED. adj. [from ale and wash.] Steeped or soaked in ale; not now in use.

What a beard of the general's cut, and a horrid suit of the camp, will do among foaming battles and alewashed wits, is wonderful to be thought on. Shakspeare.

A'LEWIFE. n. s. [from ale and wife.] A woman that keeps an alehouse.

Perhaps he will swagger and hector, and threaten to beat and butcher an alewife, or take the goods by force, and throw them the bad halfpence. Swift, Draper's Letters.

A'LEXANDERS. n. s. [smyrnium, Lat.] The name of a plant.

A'LEXANDER'S-FOOT. n. s. The name of an herb.

ALEXA'NDRINE. n. s. A kind of verse borrowed from the French, first used in a poem called Alexander. They consist, among the French, of twelve and thirteen syllables, in alternate couplets; and, among us, of twelve.

Our numbers should, for the most part, be lyrical. For variety, or rather where the majesty of thought requires it, they may be stretched to the English heroick of five feet, and to the French Alexandrine of six. Dryden.

Then, at the last, an only couplet fraught,
With some unmeaning thing they call a thought,
A needless Alexandrine ends the song,
That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along. Pope, Essay on Criticism.

ALEXA'NDRINE.* adj. Relating to the verse so called.

Some antidotal quality it may have, since not only the bone in the heart, but the horn of a deer, is alexipharmick. Brown, Vulg. Err.

It should be written alexipharmack; as alexipharmacal is, and as the derivation requires.

ALEXITE'RICAL, or ALEXITE'RICK. adj. [from ἀλεξέω.] That drives away poison; that resists fevers.

A'LGA.* n. s. [Lat. alga.] Sea-weed.

Oceanus was garlanded with alga, or sea-grass; and in his hand a trident. B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

Dryden, Astr. Red. v. 120.

A'LGATES.† adv. [Sax. algeatep, all-ways. Gate is the same as via; and still used for way in the Scottish dialect, and in the North of England. See AGATE.] On any terms; every way. Now obsolete.

Nor had the boaster ever risen more,
But that Renaldo's horse ev'n then down fell,
And with the fall his leg oppress'd so sore,
That, for a space, there must he algates dwell.
Fairfax.

A'LGEBRA. n. s. [an Arabick word of uncertain etymology; derived, by some, from Geber the philosopher; by some, from gefr, parchment; by others, from algehista, a bonesetter; by Menage, from algiabarat, the restitution of things broken.] A peculiar kind of arithmetick, which takes the quantity sought, whether it be a number or a line, or any other quantity, as if it were granted, and, by means of one or more quantities given, proceeds by consequence, till the quantity at first only supposed to be known, or at least some power thereof, is found to be equal to some quantity or quantities which are known, and consequently itself is known. This art was in use among the Arabs, long before it came into this part of the world; and they are supposed to have borrowed it from the Persians, and the Persians from the Indians. The first Greek author of algebra was Diophantus, who, about the year 800, wrote thirteen books. In 1494, Lucas Pacciolus, or Lucas de Burgos, a cordelier, printed a treatise of algebra, in Italian, at Venice. He says, that algebra came originally from the Arabs. After several improvements by Vieta, Oughtred, Harriot, Descartes, Sir Isaac Newton brought this art to the height at which it still continues.

Trevoux and Chambers.

It would surely require no very profound skill in algebra, to reduce the difference of ninepence in thirty shillings. Swift.

1. A Latin word, signifying otherwise; often used in the trials of criminals whose danger has obliged them to change their names; as Simson, alias Smith, alias Baker; that is, otherwise Smith, otherwise Baker. It is also applied to places; and generally to any persons known, or supposed to be known, by a second name.

What nation formerly knew not the acts of Englishmen better than themselves? otherwise, Polydore Virgil had not undertook, to our shame and prejudice, the English chronology; nor Verstegan, alias Rowly, the confidence to render wellnigh all the considerable gentry of this land, from the etymology of their names, Teutonicks. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 396.

If one born out of the king's allegiance, come and dwell in England, his children (if he beget any here) are not aliens, but denisons. Cowel.

But it is a common and forcible expression in our old language. It is found in our translation of the Bible, though some editions corruptly and improperly read "all to break," as if the verb were in the infinitive mood.

4. All is much used in composition: but, in most instances, it is merely arbitrary; as, all-commanding. Sometimes the words compounded with it, are fixed and classical; as, Almighty. When it is connected with a participle, it seems to be a noun; as, all-surrounding: in other cases an adverb; as, all-accomplished, or completely accomplished. Of these compounds, a small part of those which may be found, has been inserted by Dr. Johnson: and a considerable addition is now made. There are indeed few adjectives or participles, which may not be found thus compounded. They abound in modern poetry, particularly in that of Thomson and Young.

To ALLA'Y.† v. a. [from alloyer, Fr. to mix one metal with another in order to coinage; it is therefore derived by some from à la loi, according to law, the quantity of metals being mixed according to law; by others, from allier, to unite; perhaps from allocare, to put together.]

1. To mix one metal with another, to make it fitter for coinage. In this sense, most authors preserve the original French orthography, and write alloy. See ALLOY. Roquefort, in his old French Glossary, gives us the verb allaier or allayor, "battre monnoie par ordre du souverain;" so that what Dr. Johnson has just said of the original orthography is questionable.
2. To join any thing to another, so as to abate its predominant qualities. It is used commonly in a sense contrary to its original meaning, and is, to make something bad, less bad. To obtund; to repress; to abate. Dr. Johnson might have added that the expression is often applied to the mixture of wine and other liquours with water. Thus, in our old dictionaries, "To alay wine, diluo; alaide wine, vinum aquaticum."

Sir Diaphanous is a recusant
In sack: He only takes it in French wine.
With an allay of water. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady, iii. 1.

No friendly offices shall alter or allay that rancour, that frets in some hellish breasts, which, upon all occasions, will foam out at its foul mouth in slander and invective. South.

3. To quiet; to pacify; to repress. The word, in this sense, I think not to be derived from the French alloyer, but to be the English word lay, with a before it, according to the old form.

If by your art, you have
Put the wild waters in this roar, allay them.
Shakspeare.

ALLA'Y.† n. s. [alloy, Fr.]

1. The metal of a baser kind mixed in coins, to harden them, that they may wear less. Gold is allayed with silver and copper, two carats to a pound Troy; silver with copper only, of which eighteen pennyweight is mixed with a pound. Cowel thinks the allay is added, to countervail the charge of coining; which might have been done only by making the coin less.

We are gold,
In our own natures pure; but when we suffer,
The husband's stamp upon us, then allays,
And base ones, of you men, are mingled with us,
And make us blush like copper.
Beaum. and Fl. Woman's Prize, i. 3.

For fools are stubborn in their way,
As coins are harden'd by th' allay. Hudibras.

2. Any thing which, being added, abates the predominant qualities of that with which it is mingled; in the same manner, as the admixture of baser metals allay the qualities of the first mass.

Dark colours easily suffer a sensible allay, by little scattering light. Newton, Opticks.

3. Allay being taken from baser metals, commonly implies something worse than that with which it is mixed.

The joy has no allay of jealousy, hope and fear. Roscommon.

ALLA'YER. n. s. [from allay.] The person or thing which has the power or quality of allaying.

ALLA'YMENT. n. s. [from allay.] That which has the power of allaying or abating the force of another.

Or brew it to a weak and colder palate,

ALLE'CTIVE.* n. s. [from the verb.] Allurement; and, in our elder dictionaries, called "sweetness in feeling."

With ignominious words, though darkly coucht?
As if she had suborned some to swear
False allegations, to o'erthrow his state.

3. An excuse; a plea.

I omitted no means to be informed of my errours; and I expect not to be excused in any negligence on account of youth, want of leisure, or any other idle allegations. Pope.

To ALLE'GE. v. a. [allego, Lat.]

1. To affirm; to declare; to maintain.
2. To plead as an excuse, or produce as an argument.

Travels, p. 364. Cowel says, the corruption is from the Portugal word allagarto; a crocodile. See Cowel, under the word ANCIENT. Lagarto is the Spanish for a lizard; and Herrera calls the caiman, "lagarto o crocodilo." The crocodile. This name is chiefly used for the crocodile of America, between which, and that of Africa, naturalists have laid down this difference, that one moves the upper, and the other the lower jaw; but this is now known to be chimerical, the lower jaw being equally moved by both. See CROCODILE.

ALLO'DIUM.† n. s. [A word of very uncertain derivation, but most probably of German original, Dr. Johnson says. Brady, in his Glossary annexed to his Old English History, mentions Wendelin's derivation of it from the Sax. ael, omnis, and lob, which he renders onus, from laban, tollere, auferre; but he rightly adds, that there is no congruity of sense between the two words. The same etymologist proposes also the Sax. aelb, senex; because allodium was an old patrimonial inheritance that descended from ancestors in blood. Hickes derives it from the Teutonick all and lod or lood, the annual produce of the land or farm. Somner, Sax. ael or all, and Teut. heyd or heit, which we call hode or hood, that is, allhoode; which expresses the nature and condition of a thing, as knight-hode, man-hode, neighbour-hode, and many more, which denote, as it were, the totality and integrity of a thing. Or, Goth. all, omnis, and od, possessio, q. d. omnimoda possessio. V. Eng. and Swed. Dict. of Serenius. The example, which I give from our learned divine, Dr. Hammond, presents a mistaken etymology of the word. Mr. Boucher inclines to the etymology of the Saxon a, denoting to or unto, and leob the people: or else to the a privative, and leob a vassal or a fine.] A possession held in absolute independence, without any acknowledgement of a lord paramount. It is opposed to fee, or feudum, which intimates some kind of dependence. There are no allodial lands in England, all being held either mediately or immediately of the king.

But the Spanish have almendra; and perhaps amand, amandola, and this, are all referrable to amygdalum, as that is to ἀμυγδαλον.] The nut of the almond tree, either sweet or bitter.

Mark well the flow'ring almonds in the wood,
If od'rous blooms the bearing branches load,

Great heats will follow, and large crops of grain.
Dryden.

A'LMONDS OF THE THROAT, or TONSILS, called improperly Almonds of the Ears; are two round glands placed on the sides of the basis of the tongue, under the common membrane of the fauces; each of them has a large oval sinus, which opens into the fauces; and in it are a great number of lesser ones, which discharge themselves through the great sinus of a mucous and slippery matter into the fauces, larynx, and œsophagus, for the moistening and lubricating those parts. When the œsophagus muscle acts, it compresses the almonds, and they frequently are the occasion of a sore throat. Quincy.

The tonsils, or almonds of the ears, are also frequently swelled in the king's evil; which tumour may be very well reckoned a species of it. Wiseman's Surgery.

And almost faints beneath the glowing weight.
Addison.

ALMS.† n. s. [Sax. almer, elmer, ælmer, ælmerre, from the Lat. eleemosyna. Gr. ἐλεημοσύνη. Formerly written almosine, almosie, almose; or, almous, as it is in Scotland; almesse, as in Chaucer, and in writers of the sixteenth century also; and now alms. Dr. Johnson says the word has no singular. But both his examples of the word shew, to which I add others, that, though it terminates in s, it has the singular form or construction. It is, in fact, without a plural; the spelling of almesse having passed first into almes, and then into alms.] What is given gratuitously in relief of the poor.

My arm'd knees,
Which bow'd but in my stirrup, bent like his

ALMS-PEOPLE.* n. s. Members of an almshouse.

A'LMUG-TREE. n. s. A tree mentioned in scripture.

Of its wood were made musical instruments, and it was used also in rails, or in a staircase. The Rabbins generally render it coral, others ebony, brazil, or pine. In the Septuagint it is translated wrought wood, and in the Vulgate, Ligna Thyina. But coral could never answer the purposes of the almugim; the pine-tree is too common in Judea to be imported from Ophir; and the Thyinum, or citron-tree, much esteemed by the ancients for its fragrance and beauty, came from Mauritania. By the wood almugim, or algumim, or, simply gummim, taking al for a kind of article, may be understood oily and gummy sorts of wood, and particularly the trees which produce gum ammoniack, or gum arabick; and is, perhaps, the same with the Shittim wood mentioned by Moses. Calmet.

And the navy also of Hiram that brought gold from Ophir, brought in from Ophir great plenty of almug-trees and precious trees. 1 Kings, x. 11.

A'LNAGE. n. s. [from aulnage, or aunage, Fr.] Ell-measure, or rather the measuring by the ell or yard. Dict.

A'LNIGHT. n. s. [from all and night.]

A service which they call alnight, is a great cake of wax, with the wick in the midst; whereby it cometh to pass, that the wick fetcheth the nourishment farther off. Bacon.

A'LOES.† n. s. [אהלים, as it is supposed, Dr. Johnson says. Sax. alepa, S. Joh. cap. xix. 39.] A term applied to three different things.

1. A precious wood used, in the East, for perfumes, of which the best sort is of higher price than gold, and was the most valuable present given by the king of Siam, in 1686, to the king of France. It is called Tambac, and is the heart, or innermost part, of the aloe-tree; the next part to which is called Calembac, which is sometimes imported into Europe, and, though of inferiour value to the Tambac, is much esteemed: the part next the bark is termed, by the Portuguese, Pao d'aquila, or eagle-wood; but some account the eagle-wood not the outer part of the Tambac, but another species. Our knowledge of this wood is yet very imperfect. Savary.

2. Aloes is a tree which grows in hot countries, and even in the mountains of Spain.

3. Aloes is a medicinal juice extracted not from the odoriferous, but the common aloes tree, by cutting the leaves, and exposing the juice that drops from them to the sun. It is distinguished into Socotorine and Caballine, or horse aloes; the first is so called from Socotora; the second, because, being coarser, it ought to be confined to the use of farriers. It is a warm and strong cathartick.

ALOE'TICAL. adj. [from aloes.] Consisting chiefly of aloes.

It may be excited by aloetical, scammoniate, or acrimonious medicines. Wiseman's Surgery.

ALO'FT.† adv. [loffter, to lift up, Dan. Loft, air, Icelandish; so that aloft is, into the air; anciently written, on loft.]

1. On high; above; in the air. Dr. Johnson says it is used chiefly in poetry. He had forgotten the usage of it by some of our best authors, and particularly the application of it in the Bible, where the marginal reading is this:

The name of the Lord is a strong tower, the righteous runneth into it, and is set aloft. Prov. xviii. 10.

Now is all Israel aloft, (which is interpreted in the margin of the Apocrypha, exalted.) 1 Esdras, viii. 92.

ALO'NE.† adj. [alleen, Dutch; from al and een, or one, that is, single; anciently written all-one, i. e. entirely single. Some derive it from the Fr. à l'un.]

1. Without another.

Betwixt ourselves let us decide it then. Shaks.

If by a mortal hand my father's throne
Could be defended, 'twas by mine alone. Dryd.

We do not trust your uncle; he would keep you
A bachelor still, by keeping of your portion;
And keep you not alone without a husband,
But in a sickness. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

ALO'NE. adv.

1. This word is seldom used but with the word let, if even then it be an adverb. It implies sometimes an ironical prohibition, forbidding to help a man who is able to manage the affair himself.

Let us alone to guard Corioli,
If they set down before's; 'fore they remove,
Bring up your army. Shakspeare.

ALO'NENESS.* n. s. [from alone.] That state which belongs not to another. A very significative word, and properly applied to God. I know of no lexicographer who has noticed this word; but I wonder that it escaped Mr. Boucher, who has minutely illustrated alonely.

God being sibi solus, αυτάρχης, αυτόων, from everlasting, alone himself, and beside himself nothing, the first thing he did or possibly and conceivably could do, was to determine to communicate himself, and did so accordingly, primò primùm, communicate himself out of his Alonenesse everlasting unto somewhat else. Mountagu's App. to Cæsar, p. 61.

ALO'NG.† adv. [Sax. anblanz, onblonz, in longum.]

A tyrant's curb; and restive breaks the reins.

(Though mine the woman) for my ravish'd prize.
Dryden.

6. Forward; onward. In this sense it is derived from allons, Fr.

Come then, my friend, my genius, come along,
Thou master of the poet and the song. Pope.

7. Owing to; in consequence of. [Sax. ȝe-lanȝ, long of; not from onb-lonȝ, as Mr. Tyrwhitt mistakenly asserts, in respect to this old usage of the word. Dr. Johnson, under the word long, has stated that synonymous adverb, or rather abbreviation of along, to be from the Sax. ȝe-lanȝ, a fault, not considering, as Mr. Horne Tooke has observed, the ancient and accustomed distinction of along, Saxon as well as English. See also Lye, Dict. Sax. Goth. Lat. in anblanȝ or onblonȝ, and ȝelanȝ.]

I cannot tell whereon it was along,
But well I wot great strife is us among.

ALO'NG-SIDE.* adv. A naval term. By the side of the ship.

ALO'NGST.† adv. [Dr. Johnson considers this word as a corruption of along. But this form of annexing to prepositions the termination of the superlative degree, is, as Mr. Boucher has observed, very ancient, and was practised by the Saxons. It is used by Scottish writers of modern times.] Along; through the length.

Hard by grew the true lover's primrose, whose kind savour wisheth men to be faithful and women courteous. Alongst, in a border, grew maidenhair.
Greene, Quip for an Upstart Courtier, p. 6.

Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

ALO'OF.† adv. [all off, that is, quite off.]

1. At a distance; with the particle from. It generally implies a small distance, such as is within view or observation, Dr. Johnson says; but it also signifies distance as remote as possible. Witness the two examples from the English Seneca.

How then is the sinner aloof from God? From the holinesse of God; from the grace and mercy of God; from the glory of God: from the holinesse of God, he is no less distant than evil is from good, which is no less than infinitely.

L'Estrange, Fables.

The strong may fight aloof; Ancæus try'd
His force too near, and by presuming dy'd.
Dryden, Fables.

3. In a figurative sense, it is used to import art or cunning in conversation, by which a man holds the principal question at a distance.

But with a crafty madness keeps aloof,
When we would bring him on to some confession
Of his true state. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

4. It is used metaphorically of persons that will not be seen in a design.

And thrice he shook aloft a golden cloud. Dryden.

I look'd aloft, and would not look alow.
Mir. for Mag. p. 318.

And now alow, and now aloft they fly,
As borne through air, and seem to touch the sky.
Dryden.

ALP.* n. s. [Bas Bret. alp, alb, mons. Ital. alpé. Some consider the etymology of this word, as meaning strictly, "a mountain white with snow," Gr. ἄλφος, Lat. albus. And because the Alps, which separate Italy from Germany and France, "perpetuis ferè nivibus albescunt." But the name alp is not peculiar to those mountains: "Alpes—etiam universim quivis montes altiores." Du Cange, in V.] That which is mountainous or durable like the Alps; a mountain in general.

To send one away. Cockeram.

AMANDA'TION. n. s. [from amando, Lat.] The act of sending on a message, or employment.

AMANUE'NSIS.† n. s. [Lat.] A person who writes what another dictates; or copies what has been written by another.

I had not that happy leisure; no amanuenses, no assistants. Burton, Anat. Mel. to the Reader, p. 12.

In so many copies as have been made of the gospel, before printing was known; and considering the many translations of it into several languages, where the idioms are different, and the phrases may be mistaken; together with the natural slips of amanuenses; it is much more wonderful that there are no more various lections, than that there are so many.
Leslie's Truth of Christianity, p. 52.

The principal design of Bentley's notes is to prove that Milton's native text was vitiated by an infinite variety of licentious interpolations, and factitious readings, which, as he pretends, proceeded from the artifice, the ignorance, or the misapprehension, of an amanuensis, to whom Milton, being blind, had been compelled to dictate his verses.
Warton, Pref. to Milton, S. P.

A'MARANTH. n. s. [amaranthus, Lat. from α and μαράινω.]

1. The name of a plant.

The flowers have no petals; the cup of the flower is dry and multifid; the seeds are included in membranaceous vessels, which, when come to maturity, burst open transversely or horizontally, like purslane, each of which contains one or more roundish seeds.

Among the many species, the most beautiful are, 1. The tree amaranth. 2. The long pendulous amaranth, with reddish coloured seeds, commonly called Love lies a bleeding.

2. In poetry, it is sometimes an imaginary flower, supposed, according to its name, never to fade.

Immortal amaranth! a flower which once
In paradise, fast by the tree of life,
Began to bloom; but soon, for man's offence,
To heav'n remov'd, where first it grew, there grows,
And flowers aloft, shading the fount of life;
And where the river of bliss, through midst of heaven,
Rowls o'er Elysian flowers her amber stream:
With these, that never fade, the Spirits elect
Bind their resplendent locks, inwreathed with beams. Milton, P. L.

AMARA'NTHINE. adj. [amaranthinus, Lat.] Relating to amaranths; consisting of amaranths.

By the streams that ever flow,
By the fragrant winds that blow
O'er the Elysian flowers,

To AMA'SS. v. a. [amasser, Fr.]

1. To collect together in one heap or mass.

The rich man is not blamed, as having made use of any unlawful means to amass riches, as having thriven by fraud and injustice. Atter. Serm.

When we would think of infinite space, or duration, we, at first step, usually make some very large idea, as perhaps of millions of ages, or miles, which possibly we double and multiply several times. All that we thus amass together in our thoughts, is positive, and the assemblage of a great number of positive ideas of space or duration. Locke.

2. In a figurative sense, to add one thing to another, generally with some share of reproach, either of eagerness or indiscrimination.

Such as amass all relations, must err in some, and be unbelieved in many. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Do not content yourselves with mere words, lest your improvements only amass a heap of unintelligible phrases. Watts, Improvement of the Mind.

The life of Homer has been written, by amassing of all the traditions and hints the writers could meet with, in order to tell a story of him to the world. Pope.

Courted of many a jolly paramour,
The which did them in modest wise amate,
And each one sought his lady to aggrate.
Spenser, F. Q.

2. To terrify; to strike with horrour. In this sense, it is derived from the old French, matter, to crush or subdue, Dr. Johnson says. It may also be referred to the Sp. matare, Ital. mattare, Lat. mactare.

But in the porch, that did them sore amate,
A flaming fire ymixt with smouldry smoke
And stinking sulphure, that with griesly hate
And dreadfull horror did all entraunce choke,
Enforced them their forward footing to revoke.
Spenser, F. Q.

When we are so easily dor'd and amated with every sophism, it is a certain argument of great defect of inward furniture and worth.

Burke.

A'MATORY. adj. [amatorius, Lat.] Relating to love; causing love.

It is the same thing whether one ravish Lucretia by force, as Tarquin, or by amatory potions, not only allure her, but necessitate her to satisfy his lust, and incline her effectually, and draw her inevitably to follow him spontaneously.
Bp. Bramhall, against Hobbes.

AMAURO'SIS. n. s. [ἀμαυρόω.] A dimness of sight, not from any visible defect in the eye, but from some distemperature of the inner parts, occasioning the representations of flies and dust floating before the eyes: which appearances are the parts of the retina hid and compressed by the blood vessels being too much distended; so that, in many of its parts, all sense is lost; and therefore no images can be painted upon them, whereby the eyes, continually rolling round, many parts of objects falling successively upon them, are obscure. The cure of this depends upon a removal of the stagnations in the extremities of those arteries which run over the bottom of the eye. Quincy.

To AMA'ZE.† v. a. [from a and maze, perplexity; or it may be referred to the old Fr. amatir, to confound.]

O step between her and her fighting soul:
Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works. Shaks.

And fightest with the sword. Shakspeare.

AMAZO'NIAN.* adj. [from amazon.]

1. Warlike; usually applied to a virago.

Mahomet, by right of primogeniture, claimed but could not have the crown, so strong a faction was raised by his virago sister, Peria-Conconna, in the behalf of Ismael the second brother: — command was given to Salmas-Mirza, general of the horse, to retaliate his [Mahomet's] amazonian sister; and accordingly her head with her long curled hair dangling down was upon a spear's point presented to Mahomet.

The word ambages is of high authority in our writings.

Calchas led us with ambages,
That is to saine, with double wordis slie,
Such as men clepen a word with two visages.

A'MBASSADE. n. s. [ambassade, Fr.] Embassy; character or business of an ambassadour: a word not now in use.

When you disgraced me in my ambassade,
Then I degraded you from being king. Shaks.

AMBA'SSADOUR.† n. s. [ambassadeur, Fr. embaxador, Span. It is written differently, as it is supposed to come from the French or Spanish language; and the original derivation being uncertain, it is not easy to settle its orthography. Some derive it from the Hebrew בשר, to tell, and מכשר, a messenger; others from ambactus, which, in the old Gaulish, signified a servant; whence ambascia, in low Latin, is found to signify service, and ambasciator, a servant; others deduce it from ambacht, in old Teutonick, signifying a government; and Junius mentions a possibility of its descent from ανάβαινω; and others from am for ad, and bassus, low, as supposing the act of sending an ambassadour, to be in some sort an act of submission. Goth. anabudans, one commanded; a bearer of commands, Sax. ambiht-men, messengers. Goth. also andbahts, a servant. Wachter derives ambacht, a servant, from amb, about, and achten, to follow. All these derivations lead us to write ambassadour, not embassador.] A person sent in a publick manner from one sovereign power to another, and supposed to represent the power from which he is sent. The person of an ambassadour is inviolable.

Ambassadour is, in popular language, the general name of a messenger from a sovereign power, and sometimes, ludicrously, from common persons. In the juridical and formal language, it signifies particularly a minister of the highest rank residing in another country, and is distinguished from an envoy, who is of less dignity.

Give first admittance to the ambassadours.
Shakspeare.

Rais'd by these hopes, I sent no news before,
Nor ask'd you leave, nor did your faith implore;
But come, without a pledge, my own ambassadour.

A'MBER. n.s. [from ambar, Arab. whence the lower writers formed ambarum.]

A yellow transparent substance of a gummous or bituminous consistence, but a resinous taste, and a smell like oil of turpentine; chiefly found in the Baltick sea, along the coasts of Prussia. Some naturalists refer it to the vegetable, others to the mineral, and some even to the animal kingdom. Pliny describes it as a resinous juice, oozing from aged pines and firs, and discharged thence into the sea. He adds, that it was hence the ancients gave it the denomination of succinum, from succus, juice. Some have imagined it a concretion of the tears of birds; others, the urine of a beast; others, the scum of the lake Cephisis, near the Atlantick; others, a congelation formed in the Baltick, and in some fountains, where it is found swimming like pitch. Others suppose it a bitumen trickling into the sea from subterraneous sources; but this opinion is also discarded, as good amber having been found in digging at a considerable distance from the sea, as that gathered on the coast. Boerhaave ranks it with camphire, which is a concrete oil of aromatick plants, elaborated by heat into a chrystalline form. Within some pieces of amber have been found leaves, and insects included; which seems to indicate, either that the amber was originally in a fluid state, or, that having been exposed to the sun, it was softened, and rendered susceptible of the leaves and insects. Amber, when rubbed, draws or attracts bodies to it; and, by friction, is brought to yield light pretty copiously in the dark. Some distinguish amber into yellow, white, brown, and black; but the two latter are supposed to be of a different nature and denomination; the one called jet, the other ambergris.

Trevoux and Chambers.

Liquid amber, is a kind of native balsam or resin, like turpentine; clear, reddish, or yellowish; of a pleasant smell, almost like ambergris. It flows from an incision made in the bark of a fine large tree in New Spain, called by the natives ososol. Chambers.

Milton, Comus, ver. 862.

A'MBERGRIS. n.s. [from amber and gris, or grey; that is, grey amber.]

A fragrant drug, that melts almost like wax, commonly of a greyish or ash colour, used both as a perfume and a cordial. Some imagine it to be the excrement of a bird, which, being melted by the heat of the sun, and washed off the shore by the waves, is swallowed by whales, who return it back in the condition we find it. Others conclude it to be the excrement of a cetaceous fish, because sometimes found in the intestines of such animals. But we have no instance of any excrement capable of melting like wax; and if it were the excrement of a whale, it should rather be found where these animals abound, as about Greenland. Others take it for a kind of wax or gum, which distils from trees, and drops into the sea, where it congeals. Many of the orientals imagine it springs out of the sea, as naphtha does out of some fountains. Others assert it to be a vegetable production, issuing out of the root of a tree, whose roots always shoot towards the sea, and discharge themselves into it. Others maintain, that ambergris is made from the honey-combs, which fall into the sea from the rocks, where the bees had formed their nests; several persons having seen pieces that were half ambergris, and half plain honey-comb; and others have found large pieces of ambergris, in which, when broke, honey-comb, and honey too, were found in the middle. Neumann absolutely denies it to be an animal substance, as not yielding in the analysis, any one animal principle. He concludes it to be a bitumen issuing out of the earth into the sea; at first of a viscous consistence, but hardening, by its mixture with some liquid naphtha, into the form in which we find it.

Trevoux and Chambers.

That happy island, where huge lemons grow,
Where shining pearl, coral, and many a pound,

1. The desire of preferment or honour.

Who would think, without having such a mind as Antiphilus, that so great goodness could not have bound gratefulness? and so high advancement not have satisfied his ambition? Sidney.

2. The desire of any thing great or excellent.

The quick'ning power would be, and so would rest;
The sense would not be only, but be well:
But wit's ambition longeth to the best,
For it desires in endless bliss to dwell. Davies.

Are capable of this ambition;
Lest zeal, now melted by the windy breath
Of soft petitions, pity and remorse,

I on the other side
Us'd no ambition to commend my deeds;
The deeds themselves, though mute, spoke loud the doer. Milton, S. A. ver. 247.

Ambition is not often used in the plural number; but the following examples warrant such usage.

There's no motion
That tends to vice in man, but I affirm
It is the woman's part: Be it lying, note it,
The woman's; flattering, her's; deceiving, her's;
Ambitions, covetings, change of prides, disdain,
Nice longings, slanders, mutability,
All faults that may be nam'd. Shakspeare, Cymb. ii. 5.

It is well, if any thing can kindle in us holy ambitions. Bp. Hall, Contemplations.

To AMBI'TION.* v. a. [from the noun.] To seek ambitiously: an uncommon English word; but the French use ambitionner.

They wrought their fates by nobler ends, by ambitioning higher honours.
Moral State of England, 1670, p. 16.

AMBI'TIOUS. adj. [ambitiosus, Lat.]

1. Seized cr touched witha mbition; desirous of advancement; eager of honours; aspiring. It has the particle of before the object of ambition, if a noun; to, if expressed by a verb.

We seem ambitious God's whole work t'undo. Donne.

The neighb'ring monarchs by thy beauty led,
Contend in crouds, ambitious of thy bed:
The world is at thy choice, except but one,
Except but him thou canst not choose alone.
Dryden.

You have been pleased not to suffer an old man to go discontented out of the world, for want of that protection, of which he had been so long ambitious. Dryden.

2. Eager to grow bigger; aspiring.

I have seen
Th' ambitious ocean swell and rage, and foam,
To be exalted with the threatening clouds. Shaks.

AMBI'TIOUSLY. adv. [from ambitious.] In an ambitious manner; with eagerness of advancement or preference.

With such glad hearts did our despairing men
Salute th' appearance of the prince's fleet;
And each ambitiously would claim the ken,
That with first eyes did distant safety meet.
Dryden.

Here Flecknoe, as a place to fame well known,
Ambitiously design'd his Sh—'s throne. Dryden.

AMBI'TIOUSNESS. n. s. [from ambitious.] The quality of being ambitious.

A'MBITUDE. n. s. [ambio, Lat.] Compass; circuit; circumference. Dict.

To A'MBLE. v. n. [ambler, Fr. ambulo, Lat.]

1. To move upon an amble. See AMBLE.

It is good, on some occasions, to enjoy as much of the present, as will not endanger our futurity; and to provide ourselves of the virtuoso's saddle, which will be sure to amble when the world is upon the hardest trot. Dryden.

2. To move easily, without hard shocks or shaking.

Who ambles time withal?—A rich man that hath not the gout; for he lives merrily, because he feels no pain; knowing no burthen of heavy tedious penury: him time ambles withal. Shakspeare, As you like it.

3. In a ludicrous sense, to move with submission, and by direction; as, a horse that ambles, uses a gait not natural.

A laughing, toying, wheedling, whimpering she,
Shall make him amble on a gossip's message,
And take the distaff with a hand as patient,
As ere did Hercules. Rowe, Jane Shore.

4. To walk daintily and affectedly.

I am rudely stampt, and want love's majesty,
To strut before a wanton ambling nymph. Shaks.

A'MBLE.† n. s. [from To amble.] A pace or movement, in which the horse removes both his legs on one side; as, on the far side, he removes his fore and hinder leg of the same side at one time, whilst the legs on the near side stand still; and when the far legs are upon the ground, the near side removes the fore leg and hinder leg, and the legs on the far side stand still. An amble is the first pace of young colts, but when they have strength to trot, they quit it. There is no amble in the manage; riding masters allow only of walk, trot, and gallop. A horse may be put from a trot to a gallop without stopping; but cannot be put from an amble to a gallop without a stop, which interrupts the justness of the manage. Farrier's Dict.

His sfede was all dapple gray,
It goth an aumble in the way.
Chaucer, Rime of Sir Topas.

Such as have translated begging out of the old hackney-pace to a fine easy amble.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour.

A'MBLER.† n. s. [from To amble.] A horse that has been taught to amble; a pacer.

A trotting horse is fit for a coach, but not for a lady's saddle; and an ambler is proper for a lady's saddle, but not for a coach. Howell, Lett. i. v. 37.

A'MBLINGLY. adv. [from ambling.] With an ambling movement.

*A'MBO. n. s. [Gr. ἀμβων, Fr. ambon.] A reading desk, or pulpit.

Between the ὑποπτίοντες and the faithful, stood the ambo or reading desk.
Sir G. Wheler, Des. of Anc. Churches, p. 76.

The principal use of this ambo was, to read the scriptures to the people, especially the epistles and gospels. They read the gospel there yet, and not at the altar. Ibid. p. 78.

Chrysostom preached in the ambo or pulpit. Ibid. p. 97.

The admirers of antiquity have been beating their brains about their ambones.
Milton, of Ref. in Eng. b. 1.

*AMBRO'SIA.† n. s. [Gr. αμβροσία.]

It is no flaming lustre made of light,
No sweet concent, or well-tim'd harmony;
Ambrosia for to feast the appetite,
Or flowery odour mix'd with spicery.
G. Fletcher, Chr. Tr. ii. 41.

2. The name of a plant; formerly written ambrose, and ambrosie; as was also the pretended ambrosia of the gods.

At first ambrose it selfe was not sweeter,
At last black hellebore was not so bitter.
Burton, Anat. of Melan. iii. 2.

The coco, another excellent fruit, — wherein we find better than the outside promised; yielding a quart of ambrosie, coloured like new white wine, but far more aromatick tasted.
Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 29.

It has male flosculous flowers, produced on separate parts of the same plant from the fruit, having no visible petals; the fruit which succeeds the female flowers, is shaped like a club, and is prickly, containing one oblong seed in each. The species are,

1. The marine or sea ambrosia. 2. Taller unsavoury sea ambrosia. 3. The tallest Canada ambrosia. Miller.

AMBRO'SIACK.* adj. [Lat. ambrosiacus.] Delicious, like ambrosia; sweet smelling.

For the ear sweet melody;
Ambrosiack odours for the smell.
B. Jonson, Poetaster.

AMBRO'SIAL. adj. [from ambrosia.] Partaking of the nature or qualities of ambrosia; fragrant; delicious; delectable.

Thus while God spake, ambrosial fragrance fill'd
All heaven, and in the blessed spirits elect
Sense of new joy ineffable diffus'd. Milton.

The gifts of heaven my following song pursues,
Aerial honey, and ambrosial dews, Dryden.

To farthest shores th' ambrosial spirit flies,
Sweet to the world and grateful to the skies.
Pope.

AMBRO'SIAN.* adj. [from ambrosia.] Sweet or odorous as ambrosia.

And swim unto Elysium's lily fields;
There in ambrosian trees I'll write a theme
Of all the woeful sighs my sorrow yields.
Song in the Seven Champ. of Chr.

A'MBRY.† n. s. [Barret gives a good description of ambry, which he derives from the Fr. aumosniere, a little purse, "wherein money was put for the poor; and at length was used for any hutch or close place to keep meat left after meals, which, at the beginning of Christianity, was ever distributed among the poor; and which we for shortness of speech call ambry." Kelham, among his Norman words, gives ambrey, a cupboard. It may be referred also to the Sax. ælmepize. The Irish are supposed to have adopted amri and the Welsh almeri, (a cupboard,) from the English. See ALMONRY, of which Dr. Johnson pronounces this word a corruption.]

1. The place where the almoner lives, or where alms are distributed.
2. The place where plate, and utensils for housekeeping, are kept; also a cupboard for keeping cold victuals: a word still used in the northern counties, and in Scotland.

AMBS ACE.† n. s. [from ambo, Lat. and ace, Dr. Johnson says. Mr. Boucher concluded, by the spelling of ambs ace, that the word was of French origin; and he says, that he searched for it in vain in several dictionaries of that language. It is certainly in Cotgrave, where under ambezats we find "faire ambezats," to cast ambes ace. Roquefort, under ambezas, says it is "mot employé au jeu de trictrac; on le nomme, bezet." Gloss. Lang. Rom.] A double ace; so called when two dice turn up the ace.

I had rather be in this choice, than throw ambs ace for my life. Shaksp. All's well that ends well.

This will be yet clearer, by considering his own instance of casting ambs ace, though it partake more of contingency than of freedom. Supposing the posture of the party's hand who did throw the dice, supposing the figure of the table, and of the dice themselves, supposing the measure of force applied, and supposing all other things which did concur to the production of that cast, to be the very same they were, there is no doubt but in this case the cast is necessary.
Bramhall against Hobbees.

To A'MBULATE.* v. n. [Lat. ambulo.] This is noticed by Mr. Boucher as a Scottish verb, but not as an English one. It is found, however, in our elder dictionaries. "To move hither and thither." So, in our elder poetry, we have the participle ambuland for ambling:

On fair ambulande horse they sit.
Gower, Conf. Am. B. 4.

And in later times, ambulant in prose.

A knight dormant, ambulant, combatant!
Gayton, Notes on Don Quix. iv. 8.

AMBULA'TION. n. s. [ambulatio, Lat.] The act of walking.

From the occult and invisible motion of the muscles in station, proceed more offensive lassitudes, than from ambulation. Brown, Vulg. Err.

A'MBULATIVE.* adj. [Fr. ambulatif.] Walking. Sherwood.

A'MBULATORY.† adj. [ambulo, Lat.]

1. That has the power or faculty of walking.

The gradient, or ambulatory, are such as require some basis, or bottom, to uphold them in their motions: such were those self-moving statues, which, unless violently detained, would of themselves run away. Wilkins, Math. Magick.

2. That happens during a passage or walk.

He was sent to conduce hither the princess of whom his majesty had an ambulatory view in his travels. Wotton.

He answered that he would consult with him of it, in confession, walking; and so accordingly, in an ambulatory confession, he at large discoursed with him of the whole plot of the powder treason.

A'MBULATORY.* n. s. ["The overmost part of a wall, within the battlements whereof men may walk." Barret, Alv.] Parvis is mentioned as a court or portico before the church of Notre Dame at Paris, in John de Meun's part of the Roman de la Rose. The word is supposed to be contracted from Paradise. This perhaps signified an ambulatory. Many of our old religious houses had a place called Paradise.
Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, i. 453.

A'MBURY.† n. s. [Sax. amppe.] A bloody wart on any part of a horse's body.

Which rous'd the Grecians from their ambuscade.

AMBUSCA'DO. n. s. [emboscada, Span.] A private post, in order to surprise an enemy.

Sometimes she driveth o'er a soldier's neck,
And then he dreams of cutting foreign throats,

Of healths five fathom deep.
Shakspeare, Romeo and Juliet.

AMBUSCA'DOED.* adj. [from ambuscado.] Privately posted.

By the way, at Radgee Mahal, he was with such fury assaulted by Ebrahim-cah (by this time re-encouraged and here ambuscado'd with six thousand horse), that little wanted of putting him to the rout. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 85.

A'MBUSH. n. s. [embusche, Fr. from bois, a wood; whence embuscher, to hide in woods, ambushes being commonly laid under the concealment of thick forests.]

Charge, charge, their ground the faint Taxallans yield,
Bo'd in close ambush, base in open field.
Dryden, Ind. Emp.

2. The act of surprising another by lying in wait, or lodging in a secret post.

Nor shall we need,
With dangerous expedition, to invade
Heav'n, whose high walls fear no assault or siege,
Or ambush from the deep. Milton, P. L.

3. The state of being posted privately, in order to surprise; the state of lying in wait.
4. Perhaps the persons placed in private stations.

For you, my noble lord of Lancaster,
Once did I lay an ambush for your life,
Shakspeare, Richard II.

To A'MBUSH.* v. a. To place in ambush.

This success persuaded them to hunt the enemy in the woods; where, whilst they were too carelessly ranging, suspecting little danger, the subtil Turk having ambushed a thousand horse in those uncouth passages, charged the Persians.

Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 281.

Thick as the shades, their issue swarming bands
Of ambush'd men, whom by their arms and dress,
To be Texallan enemies I guess.
Dryden, Ind. Emp.

A'MBUSHMENT.† n. s. [from ambush; which see.] Ambush; surprise: a word now not used, Dr. Johnson says. Yet perhaps few words have better authority than this. Dr. Johnson also has not noticed that, in poetry, this word is accented on the second syllable.

Like as a wily fox, that having spied
Where on a sunny bank the lambs do play,
Full closely creeping by the hinder side,
Lies in ambúshment of his hoped prey. Spenser.

Jeroboam caused an ambushment to come about behind them. 2 Chron. xiii. 13.

So to the Trojans' hands the Grecians were betray'd.

Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 77.

The close ambushment of worst errours.
Milton, Animadver. Pref.

All the ambushments of false promises, and ensnaring allurements, are against the law of these arms. Bp. Hooper's Works, p. 670.

A'MBUST. adj. [ambustus, Lat.] Burnt; scalded. Dict.

AMBU'STION.† n. s. [Lat. ambustio.] A burn or scald. This word is produced by Dr. Johnson without any reference; but it occurs in our old vocabularies.
Dict. Cock.

A'MEL.† n. s. [Low Lat. amaylare. Fr. emailler, email. Dan. amelerer, to enamel.] The matter with which the variagated works are overlaid, which we call enamelled.

The materials of glass melted with calcined tin, compose an undiaphanous body. This white amel is the basis of all those fine concretes that goldsmiths and artificers employ in the curious art of enamelling. Boyle on Colours.

To AME'LIORATE.* v. a. [Fr. ameliorer.] To improve.

A. Smith, Wealth of Nat. iv. 9.

The October politician is so full of charity and good nature, that he supposes, that these very robbers and murderers themselves are in a course of amelioration; on what ground I cannot conceive, except on the long practice of the crime, and by its complete success.
Burke, Regicide Peace.

A'MELLED.* part. adj. [Low. Lat. "Item calicem meum meliorem deauratum et amelatum in pede cum ymaginibus de Passione." Will of Bp. Wykeham, 1443.] Enamelled.

So doth his [the jeweller's] hand inchase in ammell'd gold. G. Chapman on B. Jonson's Sejanus.

AME'N. adv. A word of which the original has given rise to many conjectures. Scaliger writes, that it is Arabick; and the Rabbies make it the compound of the initials of three words, signifying the Lord is a faithful king; but the word seems merely Hebrew, אמן, which, with a long train of derivatives, signifies firmness, certainty, fidelity.] A term used in devotions, by which, at the end of a prayer, we mean, so be it, at the end of a creed, so it is.

One cried, God bless us! and, Amen! the other,
As they had seen me with these hangman's hands,
Listening their fear. I could not say Amen,
When they did say God bless us.
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, from everlasting and to everlasting, Amen, and Amen.

To A'MENAGE.* v. a. [Old Fr. amenier, amaigner, i. e. amener, conduire, from minare. V. Roquefort, Gloss, Lang. Rom. Or from maignée, whence ménage, emménager, &c.] To direct or manage by force. Dr. Johnson has placed this word as a substantive synonymous with amenance; but he has given no example of such word, nor do I know of any. To the existence of the verb he appears to have been a stranger.

With her, [Occasion,] whoso will raging Furor tame,
Must first begin, and well her ámenage.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. iv. xi.

A'MENANCE.† n. s. [Probably from the Lat. amœnus.] Conduct; behaviour; mien: a word disused.

For he is fit to use in all assays,
Whether for arms and warlike amenance,
Or else for wise and civil governance. Spenser.

3. To restore passages in writers which the copiers are supposed to have depraved; to recover the true reading.

Much more was to be done before Shakspeare could be restored to himself; such as amending the corrupted text, &c. Warburton, Pref. to Shaks.

To AME'ND. v. n. To grow better. To amend differs from to improve; to improve supposes or not denies that the thing is well already, but to amend implies something wrong.

As my fortune either amends or impairs, I may declare it unto you. Sidney.

At his touch
Such sanctity hath heaven given his hand,
They presently amend. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

AME'NDABLE.* adj. [Fr. amenable.] Reparable. Sherwood.

*AME'NDE.† n. s. [French. Lat. emenda, from emendare.] This word, in French, signifies a fine, by which recompense is supposed to be made for the fault committed. We use, in a cognate signification, the word amends.

AME'NDER.† n. s. [from amend. Old Fr. amendeur, emendateur.] A corrector, or one that enlargeth any thing. Barret.

AME'NDMENT. n. s. [amendement, Fr.]

1. A change from bad for the better.

Before it was presented on the stage, some things in it have passed your approbation and amendment. Dryden.

Man is always mending and altering his works; but nature observes the same tenour, because her works are so pefect, that there is no place for amendments; nothing that can be reprehended.
Ray on the Creation.

There are many natural defects in the understanding, capable of amendment, which are overlooked and wholly neglected. Locke.

2. Reformation of life.

Our Lord and Saviour was of opinion, that they which would not be drawn to amendment of life, by the testimony which Moses and the prophets have given, concerning the miseries that follow sinners after death, were not likely to be persuaded by other means, although God from the dead should have raised them up preachers. Hooker.

Behold! famine and plague, tribulation and anguish, are sent as scourges for amendment.

Your compensation makes amends. Shakspeare.

Of the amends recovered, little or nothing returns to those that had suffered the wrong, but commonly all runs into the prince's coffers. Ralegh, Essays.

There I a pris'ner chain'd, scarce freely draw
The air imprison'd also, close and damp,
Unwholesome draught; but here I feel amends,
The breath of heav'n fresh blowing, pure and sweet,
With day-spring born; here leave me to respire. Milton.

Some little hopes I have yet remaining, that I may make the world some part of amends for many ill plays, by an heroick poem. Dryden.

If our souls be immortal, this makes abundant amends and compensation for the frailties of life, and sufferings of this state. Tillotson.

It is a strong argument for retribution hereafter, that virtuous persons are very often unfortunate, and vicious persons prosperous; which is repugnant to the nature of a Being, who appears infinitely wise and good in all his works; unless we may suppose that such a promiscuous distribution, which was necessary for carrying on the designs of providence in this life, will be rectified and made amends for in another. Spectator.

AME'NITY.† n. s. [amenité, Fr. amœnitas, Lat.] Pleasantness; agreeableness of situation. Defined also, in our old dictionaries, delectableness. We had formerly the adjective amenous, in the sense of pleasant; as amene has been and is still used by the Scotch in the same signification. Amenity is now also applied to manners or behaviour.

If the situation of Babylon was such at first, as in the days of Herodotus, it was a seat of amenity and pleasure. Brown.

Paradises for amenity and delight.

AME'NTY.* n. s. [old Fr. amence, amentie, dementia.] Madness. Dict.

To AME'RCE.† v. a. [amercier, French. Οφθαλμων μὶν αμερσε, seems to give the original, Dr. Johnson thinks.]

1. To punish with a pecuniary penalty; to exact a fine; to inflict a forfeiture. It is a word originally juridical, but adopted by other writers, and is used by Spenser of punishments in general. Its original sense is of great antiquity, "Amercier, condamner quelqu'un à l'amende," being found in the language of the tenth century, (V. Lacombe,) and is ultimately to be referred to à merci.

In like manner as to fines, care is taken that they shall not be exorbitant. Where the party is to be amerced, though he be at misericordia domini regis, yet the amercement must be affirmed by the jury. Bp. Ellys, Tracts on Eng. Liberty, ii. 33.

Where every one that misseth then her make,
Shall be by him amerc't with penance due. Spens.

But I'll amerce you with so strong a fine,
That you shall all repent the loss of mine. Shaks.

All the suitors were considerably amerced; yet this proved but an ineffectual remedy for those mischiefs. Hale.

2. Sometimes with the particle in before the fine.

AME'RICAN.* n. s. [from America.] An aboriginal native of America; an inhabitant of America.

Such of late
Columbus found the American, so girt
With feather'd cincture; naked else, and wild

To shun ames ace, that swept my stakes away;

Whitlock's Manners of the Eng. p. 89.

A'METHYST. n. s. [αμεθυστος, contrary to wine, or contrary to drunkenness; so called, either because it is not quite of the colour of wine, or because it was imagined to prevent inebriation.]

A precious stone of a violet colour, bordering on purple. The oriental amethyst is the hardest, scarcest, and most valuable; it is generally of a dove colour, though some are purple, and others white like the diamond. The German is of a violet colour, and the Spanish are of three sorts; the best are the blackest or deepest violet; others are almost quite white, and some few tinctured with yellow. The amethyst is not extremely hard, but easy to be engraved upon, and is next in value to the emerald. Savary and Chambers.

Some stones approached the granate complection; and several nearly resembled the amethyst.

Or made a gift of it, my father's eye
Should hold her loathed. Shakspeare, Othello.

2. Pretending love; shewing love.

Lay amiable siege to the honesty of this Ford's wife; use your art of wooing. Shakspeare.

3. Pleasant; elegant to the eye, as our old lexicographers define it.

O grace serene! oh virtue heav'nly fair,
Divine oblivion of low-thoughted care!
Fresh blooming hope, gay daughter of the sky!
And faith, our early immortality!

Of the fruit
Of each tree in the garden we may eat;
But of the fruit of this fair tree amidst
The garden, God hath said, ye shall not eat. Milton.

The two ports, the bagnio, and Donatelli's statue of the great duke, amidst the four slaves, chained to his pedestal, are very noble sights. Addison.

What tho' no real voice nor sound
Amid the radiant orbs be found?
In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice,
For ever singing, as they shine,
"The hand that made us is divine." Addison.

AMI'SS.† adv. [from a, which, in this form of composition, often signifies according to, and miss, the English particle, which shews any thing, like the Greek παρά, to be wrong; as, to miscount, to count erroneously; to misdo, to commit a crime: amiss therefore signifies not right, or out of order.]

1. Faulty; criminal.

For that which thou hast sworn to do amiss,
Is yet amiss when it is truly done. Shaks. K. John.

2. Faultily; criminally.

The heart of man, and weigh his inmost thoughts,
If I have done amiss, impute it not. Addison.

3. In an ill sense.

And thought she wish'd to kill who long'd to kiss. Fairfax.

4. Wrong; improper; unfit.

6. Reproachful; irreverent.

Every people, nation and language, which speak any thing amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill; because there is no other God that can deliver after this sort. Daniel, iii. 29.

7. Impaired in health; as, I was somewhat amiss yesterday, but am well today.

8. Amiss is marked as an adverb, though it cannot always be adverbially rendered; because it always follows the substantive to which it relates, contrary to the nature of adjectives in English; and though we say the action was amiss, we never say an amiss action. But Mr. Mason has given an instance from Fairfax, where amiss is an adjective, and must in construction be put before the substantive; otherwise, the sense of the passage, amiss being considered as an adverb, would be just reversed.

Thou well of life, whose streams were purple blood,
That flowed here to cleanse the soul amiss
Of sinful man. Fairfax's Tasso, iii. 8.

AMI'SS.* n. s. Culpability; fault.

To AMI'T. v. a. [amitto, Lat.] To lose: a word little in use.

Ice is water congealed by the frigidity of the air, whereby it acquireth no new form, but rather a consistence or determination of its diffluency, and amitteth not its essence but condition of fluidity. Brown, Vulg. Err.

A'MITY. n. s. [amitie, Fr. amicitia, Lat.] Friendship, whether publick between nations, opposed to war, or among the people, opposed to discord, or between private persons.

The prophet David did think, that the very meeting of men together, and their accompanying one another to the house of God, should make the bond of their love insoluble, and tie them in a league of inviolable amity. Hooker.

The monarchy of Great Britain was in league and amity with all the world. Sir John Davies on Ireland.

You have a noble and a true conceit
Of godlike amity; which appears most strongly
In bearing thus the absence of your lord. Shaksp.

Pursue this race, this service dedicate
To my deplored ashes; let there be
'Twixt us and them no league nor amity. Denham.

AMMIRAL.* n. s. See ADMIRAL.

AMMO'NIACK. n. s. The name of a drug.

GUM AMMONIACK is brought from the East Indies, and is supposed to ooze from an umbelliferous plant. Dioscorides says, it is the juice of a kind of ferula growing in Barbary, and the plant is called agasyllis. Pliny calls the tree metopion, which, he says, grows near the temple of Jupiter Ammon, whence the gum takes its name. It ought to be in dry drops, white within, yellowish without, easily fusible, resinous, somewhat bitter, and of a very sharp taste and smell, somewhat like garlick. This gum is said to have served the ancients for incense in their sacrifices. Savary. Trevoux.

SAL AMMONIACK is a volatile salt of two kinds, ancient and modern. The ancient sort, described by Pliny and Dioscorides, was a native salt, generated in those large inns where the crouds of pilgrims, coming from the temple of Jupiter Ammon, used to lodge; who, travelling upon camels, and those creatures in Cyrene, where that celebrated temple stood, urining in the stables, or in the parched sands, out of this urine, which is remarkably strong, arose a kind of salt, denominated sometimes from the temple, Ammoniack, and sometimes from the country, Cyreniack. No more of this salt is produced there, and, from this deficiency, some suspect there never was any such thing: but this suspicion is removed, by the large quantities of a salt, nearly of the same nature, thrown out by mount Ætna.

The modern sal ammoniack is made in Egypt; where long-necked glass-bottles, filled with soot, a little sea-salt, and the urine of cattle, and having their mouths luted with a piece of wet cotton, are placed over an oven or furnace, in a thick bed of ashes, nothing but the necks appearing, and kept there two days and a night, with a continual strong fire. The steam swells up the cotton, and forms a paste at the vent-hole, hindering the salts from evaporating: which stick to the top of the bottle, and are taken out in those large cakes, which they send to England. Only soot exhaled from dung, is the proper ingredient in this preparation; and the dung of camels affords the strongest.

Our chymists imitate the Egyptian sal ammoniack, by adding one part of common salt to five of urine; with which some mix that quantity of soot, and putting the whole in a vessel they raise from it, by sublimation, a white, friable, farinaceous substance, which they call sal ammoniack. Chambers.

AMMONI'ACAL. adj. [from ammoniack.] Having the properties of ammoniack salt.

Human blood calcin'd, yields no fixed salt; nor is it a sal ammoniack; for that remains immutable after repeated distillations; and distillation destroys the ammonaical quality of animal salts, and turns them alkaline: so that it is a salt neither quite fixed, nor quite volatile, nor quite acid, nor quite alkaline, nor quite ammoniacal; but soft and benign, approaching nearest to the nature of sal ammoniack. Arbuthnot.

AMMUNI'TION. n. s. [supposed by some to come from amonitio, which, in the barbarous ages, seems to have signified supply of provision; but it, surely, may be more reasonably derived from munitio, fortification; choses à munitions, things for the fortresses.] Military stores.

They must make themselves defensible against strangers; and must have the assistance of some able military man, and convenient arms and ammunition for their defence. Bacon.

The colonel staid to put in the ammunition he brought with him; which was only twelve barrels of powder, and twelve hundred weight of match. Clarendon.

All the rich mines of learning ransackt are,
To furnish ammunition for this war. Denham.

But now his stores of ammunition spent,
His naked valour is his only guard:
Rare thunders are from his dumb cannon sent,
And solitary guns are scarcely heard. Dryden.

AMMUNI'TION BREAD. n. s. Bread for the supply of the armies or garrisons.

A'MNESTY.† n. s. [ἀμνηστία, Gr. The word is not old in our language. Bishop Sanderson is the earliest writer, whom I have found using it. In the Bewailing of the Peace of Germany, 1635, it is amnestia: "Excluded from pardon and amnestia," p. 46.] An act of oblivion; an act by which crimes against the government, to a certain time, are so obliterated, that they can never be brought into charge.

Abraham, to procure an everlasting amnesty, and utter cessation thenceforth of all debate between himself and his nephew Lot and their servants, made use of this one argument, as the most prevalent of all other for that end, that they were brethren. Bp. Sanderson's Sermons, p. 472.

I never read of a law enacted to take away the force of all laws, by which a man may safely commit upon the last of June, what he would infallibly be hanged for, if he committed it on the first of July; by which the greatest criminals may escape, provided they continue long enough in power, to antiquate their crimes, and, by stifling them a while, deceive the legislature into an amnesty. Swift.

AMNI'COLIST. n. s. [amnicola, Lat.] Inhabiting near a river. Dict.

AMNI'GENOUS. n. s. [amnigenus, Lat.] Born of a river. Dict.

A'MNION.† } n. s. [Lat. perhaps from A'MNIOS. } ἄμνος, Dr. Johnson says; but surely it is directly from ἄμνιον, membrana fœtum involvens.]

The innermost membrane with which the fœtus in the womb is most immediately covered, and with which the rest of the secundines, the chorion, and alantois, are ejected after birth. It is whiter and thinner than the chorion. It also contains a nutritious humour, separated by glands for that purpose, with which the fœtus is preserved. It is outwardly cloathed with the urinary membrane, and the chorion, which sometimes stick so close to one another, that they can scarce be separated. It has also its vessels from the same origin as the chorion. Quincy.

AMOLI'TION.* n. s. [Lat. amolitio.] A removal; a putting away.

We ought here to consider — a removal or amolition of that supposal; — the grounds and reasons of this amolition.

Bp. Seth Ward's Apology for the Mysteries of the Gospel, 1673, pp. 4, 5.

AMO'MUM.† n. s. [Lat.] A sort of fruit.

The commentators on Pliny and Dioscorides differ about the ancient amomum; but the generality of them suppose it to be a fruit different from ours. The modern amomum appears to be the sison of the ancients, or bastard stone parsley. It resembles the muscat grape, grows in clusters, and is about the thickness of a pea. This fruit is brought from the East Indies, and makes part of the composition of treacle. It is of a hot spicy taste and smell. Trevoux. Chambers.

Who not by corn or herbs his life sustains,
But the sweet essence of amomum drains.
Dryden, Transl. of Ovid.

AMO'NG.† } prep. [amanȝ, ȝemanȝ, Sax.
AMO'NGST. } Mr. Horne Tooke considers this word as the preterperfect ȝemanȝ, ȝemonȝ, ȝemunȝ, or amang, among, amung, of the verb mænȝan, mengan, miscere, used as a participle without the termination oð, að, or eð, and meaning purely mixed. Wachter derives the German mengen, to mix, from maengd, a multitude; among, therefore, according to this etymology, means also mixed, or in the crowd. It is written sometimes, in our old language, amonges, and is used adverbially by Gower; as in the following instances:

For ever when I thinke amonge,
How all is on my selfe alonge,
I saie, O foole of all fooles,
Thou farest as he betwene two stoles
That wolde sit, and goth to ground.
Gower, Conf. Am. B. iv.

And tho she toke hir childe in honde,
And yafe it souke; and ever amonge
She wepte, and otherwhile songe
To rocke with hir childe aslepe.
Gower, Conf. Am. B. i.

1. Mingled with; placed with other persons or things on every side.

Amongst strawberries sow here and there some borage-seed; and you shall find the strawberries under those leaves far more large than their fellows. Bacon.

The voice of God they heard,
Now walking in the garden, by soft winds
Brought to their ears, while day declin'd: they heard,
And from his presence hid themselves, among
The thickest trees, both man and wife. Milton.

2. Conjoined with others, so as to make part of the number.

I have then, as you see, observed the failings of many great wits amongst the moderns, who have attempted to write an epic poem. Dryden.

There were, among the old Roman statues, several of Venus in different postures and habits; as there are many particular figures of her made after the same design. Addison.

A'MORET.* n. s. [Ital. amoretto; and so the word is written in our own elder language.] A lover; a person enamoured.

The amoretto was wont to take his stand at one place — where sate his mistress.
Gayton's Notes on D. Quix. p. 47.

When amorets no more can shine,
And Stella owns she's not divine.
Dr. J. Warton's Poems, p. 108.

AMO'RETTE.* } n. s. [Fr. amourette.]

3. Petty amours. [Cotgrave, amourettes, love-tricks, dalliances.]

Three amours I have had in my life-time; as for amourettes, they are not worth mentioning.
Walsh's Letters.

A'MORIST.† n. s. [from amour.] An inamorato; a gallant; a man professing love. It seems to have been formerly used as a word of contempt.

I am afraid some man will take me for an amourist. Stafford's Niobe, P. 2. p. 123.

Aristotle in his Ethicks, and Tully in his Tusculan questions, distinguish betwixt ἐραστὴς the lover, and ἐρωτικὸς, the amorist; as we distinguish betwixt ebrius, one that is drunke, and ebriosus, a drunkard. Because that a lover is one, that is indeed falne in love; but an amorist is one, that is inclined to this folly, either by his natural constitution and temper of body, or else by reason of his education, discipline, custome, or the like.
Ferrand's Love Melancholy, p. 139.

I, that ev'n now lisp'd like an amorist,
Am turn'd into a snaphaunce satyrist.
Marston's Satyres, p. 38.

The pen of some vulgar amourist.
Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov. B. 2.

Female beauties are as fickle in their faces as their minds; though casualties should spare them, age brings in a necessity of decay; leaving doters upon red and white, perplexed by incertainty both of the continuance of their mistress's kindness, and her beauty, both which are necessary to the amorist's joys and quiet. Boyle.

AMORO'SO.† n. s. [Ital.] A man enamoured.

It is a gibe which an heathen puts upon an amoroso, that wastes his whole time in dalliance upon his mistress; viz. That love is an idle man's business. Hacket's Life of Abp. Williams, 1693, p. 125.

And as the piece advanc'd, the passion grew.
Prior.

2. Naturally inclined to love; disposed to fondness; fond.

Nor made to court an am'rous looking-glass,
I, that am rudely stampt. Shaksp. Rich. III.

The spirit of love, and amorous delight. Milton.

O! how I long my careless limbs to lay
Under the plantane's shade, and all the day
With am'rous airs my fancy entertain,
Invoke the muses, and improve my vein! Waller.

A'MOROUSLY.† adv. [from amorous.] Fondly; lovingly.

When thou wilt swim in that live-bath,
Each fish, which every channel hath,
Will amorously to thee swim,
Gladder to catch thee, than thou him.
Donne, Poems, p. 38.

She [the wife of Potifar] looked upon him [Joseph] amorously, or rather lasciviously.
Bp. Patrick on Genesis, 39.

A'MOROUSNESS. n. s. [from amorous.] The quality of being amorous; fondness; lovingness; love.

And for one sothe they tellin twenty lies.

To A'MPUTATE.† v. a. [amputo, Lat.] To cut off a limb: a word used only in chirurgery, Dr. Johnson says. But we had formerly the verb ampute, "to cut off," without any specification. V. Cockeram, Dict.

Amongst the cruizers, it was complained, that their surgeons were too active in amputating fractured members. Wiseman, Surgery.

AMPUTA'TION. n. s. [amputatio, Lat.] The operation of cutting off a limb, or other part of the body. The usual method of performing it, in the instance of a leg, is as follows. The proper part for the operation being four or five inches below the knee, the skin and flesh are first to be drawn very tight upwards, and secured from returning by a ligature two or three fingers broad: above this ligature another loose one is passed, for the gripe; which being twisted by means of a stick, may be straitened to any degree at pleasure. Then the patient being conveniently situated, and the operator placed to the inside of the limb, which is to be held by one assistant above, and another below the part designed for the operation, and the gripe sufficiently twisted, to prevent too large an hæmorrhage, the flesh is, with a stroke or two, to be separated from the bone with the dismembering knife. Then the periosteum being also divided from the bone with the back of the knife, saw the bone asunder, with as few strokes as possible. When two parallel bones are concerned, the flesh that grows between them must likewise be separated before the use of the saw. This being done, the gripe may be slackened, to give an opportunity of searching for the large blood vessels, and securing the hæmorrhage at their mouths. After making proper applications to the stump, loosen the first ligature, and pull both the skin and the flesh, as far as conveniently may be, over the stump, to cover it; and secure them with the cross stitch made at the depth of half or three quarters of an inch in the skin. Then apply pledgets, astringents, plaisters, and other necessaries. Chambers.

To AMU'SE.†. v. a. [amuser, Fr.]

1. To entertain with tranquillity; to fill with thoughts that engage the mind, without distracting it. To divert implies something more lively, and to please, something more important. It is therefore frequently taken in a sense bordering on contempt, Dr. Johnson says. But it is certainly used by our elder writers in the sense also of divert.

Those give themselves over to gurmandisings and drunkenness, building up shadows, amusing themselves with no other things but pleasures and belly-cheer.

Donne, Hist. of the Septuagint, (1633) p. 96.

Walsh.

2. To draw on from time to time; to keep in expectation; as, he amused his followers with idle promises. The old sense of this English verb was, "to put into a muse; to drive into a dump, i. e. a reverie; to hold, stay, or delay by a discourse, question, &c." See Cotgave, in AMUSE and AMUSER.

We do but tempt the tempter to put eternal fallacies upon us, and to amuse and scare us with one prodigy or other perpetually, as he did the heathens. Spencer on Prodigies, p. 111.

And then for the Pharisees, whom our Saviour represents as the very vilest of men, and the greatest of cheats; we have them amusing the world with pretences of a more refined devotion, while their heart was at that time in their neighbour's coffers. South, Serm. ii. 153.

Bishop Henry, on the other side, amused her with dubious answers, and kept her in suspense for some days. Swift, Character of K. Stephen.

Plucking the mossy bark of some old tree.

Lee, Jun. Brut.

AMU'SEMENT.† n. s. [amusement, Fr.]

1. That which amuses; entertainment.

Every interest or pleasure of life, even the most trifling amusement, is suffered to postpone the one thing necessary. Rogers.

During his confinement, his amusement was to give poison to dogs and cats, and see them expire by slower or quicker torments. Pope.

I was left to stand the battle, while others, who had better talents than a draper, thought it no unpleasant amusement to look on with safety, whilst another was giving them diversion, at the hazard of his liberty. Swift.

2. Profound meditation.

Here I put my pen into the ink-horn; and fell into a strong and deep amusement, revolving in my mind with great perplexity the amazing change of our affairs. Fleetwood, Pref. Lay-Baptism.

AMU'SER.† n. s. [amuseur, Fr.] He that amuses, as with false promises. The French word is always taken in an ill sense, Dr. Johnson says. Cotgrave defines that word, "an amuser of people; one that holdeth folks at gaze, or putteth them into dumps."

AMU'SINGLY.* adv. In an amusing manner.

AMU'SIVE.† adj. [from amuse.] That has the power of amusing. I know not that this is a current word, Dr. Johnson says: it is certainly a very frequent word in Thomson, who uses it five or six times in his poems.

But amaz'd,
Beholds the amusive arch before him fly,
Then vanish quite away. Thomson.

AMU'SIVELY.* In an amusive manner.

A south easterly wind succeeded, blowing fresh, and murmuring amusively among the pines.

AN.† article. [an, Goth. ane, Saxon. een, Dutch, eine, German.] The article indefinite, used before a vowel, or h mute. See A.

1. One, but with less emphasis; as, there stands a house.

A wit's a feather, and a chief a rod,
An honest man's the noblest work of God. Pope.

3. Sometimes it signifies, like a, some particular state; but this is now disused.

It is certain, that odours do, in a small degree, nourish; especially the odour of wine; and we see men an hungred do love to smell hot bread. Bacon.

4. An is sometimes, in old authours, a contraction of and if, Dr. Johnson says; which is a mistake that could not escape the notice of Mr. Tooke and Dr. Jamieson. An is if, and may be thought a contraction of and, which, in our old language, is also if. "Fayn would I do you mirth, and I wist how," says Chaucer's host; that is, "if I knew how." Mr. Tooke derives an in this sense, however, from the Sax. verb annan, to give, of which an is the imperative mood: so that this word means conditionally like the conjunction if, "give, grant, allow."

An thou wer't my father, as thou art but my brother,
My younger brother too, I must be merry.

Beaum. and Fl. Custom of the Country, i. 1.

He can't flatter, he!
An honest mind and plain, he must speak truth;
An they will take it, so; if not, he's plain.

Shakspeare.

5. Sometimes a contraction of and before if, according to Johnson; but it is no contraction, only a common redundancy of an.

Noting this penury, to myself I said
An if a man did need a poison now,
Whose sale is present death in Mantua,
Here lives a caitiff wretch would sell it him.

Shakspeare, Rom. and J. v. 1.

Well I know
The clerk will ne'er wear hair on's face that had it.
——— He will an' if he live to be a man.

Shakspeare.

6. Sometimes it is a contraction of as if. This is the concluding remark of Johnson on an; which also is exceptionable. In the example, which he cites from Addison, who however is only reciting the boast of Shakspeare's weaver when transformed into a lion, it is certainly not a contraction of as if, however it may so mean; and can be considered only as a vulgarism; the use of it, as far as I know, being confined to low characters. Mr. Tooke considers Dame Quickly and Weaver Bottom, in Shakspeare, as the only users of the phrase; but it is, with equal propriety, put into the mouth of the contemptible Pandarus.

He will weep you, an't were a man born in April. Shakspeare, Tr. and Cr.

I will roar you an't were any nightingale.

Shakspeare, Mids. N. Dr.

'A made a finer end, and went away an it had been any christom child. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

An't come to that once,
The devil pick his bones, that dies a coward.

He'll bring an apothecary, with a chargeable long bill of anas. Dryden.

A'NA.† n. s. Books so called from the last syllables of their titles; as, Scaligerana, Thuana; they are loose thoughts, or casual hints, dropped by eminent men, and collected by their friends. This definition, Mr. Mason has observed, is incomplete; the termination ana being added to any connective title of literary scraps.

They were pleased to publish some Tunbrigiana this season, but such ana! I believe there never were so many vile little verses put together before. West to Gray.

ANABAPTI'STICK.* adj. Anabaptistical.

Rodolphus Langius, a canon of Munster, and a tolerable Latin poet, after many struggles with the inveterate prejudices and authoritative threats of German bishops, and German universities, opened a school of humanity at Munster; which supplied his countrymen with every species of elegant learning, till it was overthrown by the fury of fanaticism, and the revolutions introduced by the barbarous reformations of the anabaptistick zealots, in the year 1534.

Anagram, called, "a divination by names, [is] called by the antients onomantia." The Greeks refer this invention to Lycophron — afterwards there were divers Greek wits that disported themselves herein, as he which turned Atlas, for his heavy burthen in supporting heaven, into Talas, that is, wretched. Some will maintain, that each man's fortune is written in his name, which they call anagramatism, or metagramatism.

Explan. of Hard Words, Acad. of Pleas. 1638.

ANALO'GICAL. adj. [from analogy.]

1. Used by way of analogy. It seems properly distinguished from analogous, as words from things; analogous signifies having relation, and analogical having the quality of representing relation.

It is looked on only as the image of the true God, and that not as a proper likeness, but by analogical representation. Stillingfleet.

When a word, which originally signifies any particular idea or object, is attributed to several other objects, not by way of resemblance, but on the account of some evident reference to the original idea, this is peculiarly called an analogical word: so a sound or healthy pulse, a sound digestion, sound sleep, are so called, with reference to a sound and healthy constitution; but if you speak of sound doctrine, or sound speech, this is by way of resemblance to health, and the words are metaphorical. Watts, Logick.

2. Analogous; having resemblance or relation.

I am convinced, from the simplicity and uniformity of the Divine Nature, and of all his works, that there is some one universal principle, running through the whole system of creatures analogically, and congruous to their relative natures. Cheyne.

ANA'LOGOUS.† adj. [ἀνα and λόγος. Though analogy is used by Hooker; analogous, Mr. Malone thinks, was not introduced into our language till after the Restoration; for Fuller (Worthies in Bristol) uses, in its stead, το αναλογον. L'Estrange is the earliest authour quoted by Johnson.]

1. Having analogy; bearing some resemblance or proportion; having something parallel.

Exercise makes things easy, that would be otherwise very hard; as, in labour, watchings, heats, and colds; and then there is something analogous in the exercise of the mind, to that of the body. It is folly and infirmity that makes us delicate and froward. L'Estrange.

Many important consequences may be drawn from the observation of the most common things, and analogous reasonings from the causes of them. Arbuthnot.

ANA'LOGY.† n. s. [ἀναλογια.]

1. Resemblance between things with regard to some circumstances or effects; as, learning is said to enlighten the mind; that is, it is to the mind what light is to the eye, by enabling it to discover that which was hidden before. Dr. Johnson. — This definition is not exact. There may be the closest resemblance between the circumstances and the effects of two things, and yet no analogy. There is a resemblance between a hat and a coat, in their colour, in their being both on the body, and both tending to keep it warm; but no one would say that there is any analogy. The word signifies the similitude of relations; and so it is given by Euclid, B. 5. only confining the relations to those of magnitude. "Analogy is the similitude of ratios." Thus, in Dr. Johnson's own explanation, learning has the same relation to the mind, which light has to the eye. Hence, analogically, learning is said to enlighten the mind.

From God it hath proceeded, that the church hath evermore held a prescript form of common prayer, although not in all things every where the same, yet, for the most part, retaining the same analogy. Hooker.

What I here observe of extraordinary revelation and prophecy, will, by analogy and due proportion, extend even to those communications of God's will, that are requisite to salvation. South.

2. When the thing to which the analogy is supposed, happens to be mentioned, analogy has after it the particles to or with; when both the things are mentioned after analogy, the particle between or betwixt is used.

If the body politick have any analogy to the natural, an act of oblivion were necessary in a hot distemper'd state. Dryden.

If we make Juvenal express the customs of our country rather than of Rome, it is when there was some analogy betwixt the customs. Dryden.

3. By grammarians, it is used to signify the agreement of several words in one common mode; as, from love is formed loved, from hate, hated, from grieve, grieved.

ANA'LYSIS. n. s. [ἀνάλυσις.]

1. A separation of a compound body into the several parts of which it consists.

There is an account of dew falling, in some places, in the form of butter, or grease, which grows extemely fetid; so that the analysis of the dew of any place, may, perhaps, be the best method of finding such contents of the soil as are within the reach of the sun. Arbuthnot.

2. A consideration of any thing in parts, so as that one particular is first considered, then another.

Of a long time I have suspected, that these modern analyticks were not scientifical.
Bp. Berkeley, Analyst, § 50.

To A'NALYZE. v. a. [ἀναλύω.] To resolve a compound into its first principles. See ANALYSIS.

Chymistry enabling us to depurate bodies, and, in some measure, to analyze them, and take asunder their heterogeneous parts, in many chymical experiments, we may, better than in others, know what manner of bodies we employ; art having made them more simple or uncompounded, than nature alone is wont to present them us. Boyle.

To analyze the immorality of any action into its last principles; if it be inquired, why such an action is to be avoided, the immediate answer is, because it is sin. Norris, Miscell.

When the sentence is distinguished into subject and predicate, proposition, argument, act, object, cause, effect, adjunct, opposite, &c. then it is analyzed analogically and metaphysically. Anastrophe [is] a preposterous order, or a backward setting of words, thus: All Italy about I went, which is contrary to plain order, I went about all Italy. Peacham, Gard. of Eloq.

Anastrophe, or inversion, is a figure by which we place last, and perhaps at a great distance from the beginning of the sentence, what, according to the common order, should have been placed first. Milton begins his Paradise Lost by a beautiful example of this figure. Walker, Rhetor. Grammar.

ANA'THEMA.† n. s. [Gr. ἀνάθεμα.]

1. A curse pronounced by ecclesiastical authority; excommunication.

The anathemata of the church sometimes denote more particularly those gifts, which were hanged upon pillars, and set in public view, as memorials of some great mercy which men had received from God. In allusion to which, Socrates thinks the term anathema is used for excommunication, because thereby a man's condemnation is published and proclaimed, as if it were hanged up upon a pillar. Christian Antiquities, i. 249.

Her bare anathemas fall but like so many bruta fulmina upon the schismatical; who think themselves shrewdly hurt, forsooth, by being cut off from the body, which they choose not to be of.
South, Sermons.

2. Anglicised, and written anatheme; but little used. It is written anathem, among the hard words explained in Sylvester's Du Bartas, ed. 1621. p. 655.

But how is this divinity confronted by the Apostle, who hath denounced an anatheme to him, whosoever shall deliver as matter of faith (for so the Apostle must be understood) beside what was then delivered?
Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist (1616) p. 5.

Your holy father of Rome hath smitten with his thunderbolt of excommunications and anathemes, at one time or other, most of the orthodox churches of the world. Sheldon, Mirac. of Ant. 1616, p. 129.

3. The object of the curse, or person cursed. This seems the original meaning, though now little used.

She therefore [the church of Rome] who is so very liberal of her anathemas and curses upon others, is herself anathematized, with a vengeance, by one whose authority she herself acknowleges to be divine. Trapp, Popery truly stated, Part I.

ANA'THEMATIZER.* n. s. [from anathema.] He who pronounces an anathema or curse.

The higher strain of the censorious anathematizer, that breathes out woes and damnations. Hammond, Sermons.

How many famous churches have been most unjustly thunderstruck with direful censures of excommunications, upon pretence of this crime, which have been less guilty than their anathematizers! Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

ANATI'FEROUS. adj. [from anas and fero, Lat.] Producing ducks. Not in use.

If there be anatiferous trees, whose corruption breaks forth into barnacles; yet, if they corrupt, they degenerate into maggots, which produce not them again. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ANATO'MICAL.† adj. [Lat. anatomicus, Fr. anatomique.]

1. Relating or belonging to anatomy.

When we are taught by logick to view a thing completely in all its parts, by the help of division, it has the use of an anatomical knife, which dissects an animal body, and separates the veins, arteries, nerves, muscles, membranes, &c. and shews us the several parts which go to the composition of a complete animal. Watts, Logick.

2. Proceeding upon principles taught in anatomy; considered as the object of anatomy.

There is a natural, involuntary distortion of the muscles, which is the anatomical cause of laughter; but there is another cause of laughter, which decency requires. Swift.

3. Anatomized; dissected; separated.

The continuation of solidity is apt to be confounded with, and, if we will look into the minute antomical parts of matter, is little different from, hardness. Locke.

ANATO'MICALLY. adv. [from anatomical.] In an anatomical manner; in the sense of an anatomist; according to the doctrine of anatomy.

While some affirmed it had no gall, intending only thereby no evidence of anger or fury, others have construed anatomically, and denied that part at all. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ANA'TOMIST.† n. s. [Gr. ἀνατομὸς, Fr. anatomiste.] He that studies the structure of animal bodies, by means of dissection; he that divides the bodies of animals, to discover the various parts.

Anatomists adjudged, that if nature had been suffered to run her own course, without this fatal interruption, he might have doubled his age. Howell.

Hence when anatomists discourse,
How like brutes organs are to ours;
They grant, if higher powers think fit,
A bear might soon be made a wit;
And that, for any thing in nature,
Pigs might squeak love odes, dogs bark satire.
Prior.

To ANA'TOMIZE.† v. a. [Gr. ἀνατέμνω, Fr. anatomiser.]

1. To dissect an animal; to divide the body into its component or constituent parts.

Our industry must even anatomize every particle of that body, which we are to uphold. Hooker.

2. To lay any thing open distinctly, and by minute parts.

I speak but brotherly of him, but should I anatomize him to thee as he is, I must blush and weep, and then must look pale and wonder. Shakspeare.

Then dark distinctions reason's light disguis'd,
And into atoms truth anatomiz'd. Denham.

ANA'TOMY. n. s. [Gr. ἀνατομία.]

1. The art of dissecting the body.

It is proverbially said, Formicæ sua bilis inest, habet et musca splenem; whereas these parts anatomy hath not discovered in insects. Brown, Vulg. Err.

It is therefore in the anatomy of the mind, as in that of the body; more good will accrue to mankind, by attending to the large, open, and perceptible parts, than by studying too much such finer nerves and vessels, as will for ever escape our observation. Pope.

2. The doctrine of the structure of the body, learned by dissection.

Let the muscles be well inserted and bound together, according to the knowledge of them which is given us by anatomy. Dryden.

3. The act of dividing any thing, whether corporeal or intellectual.

4. The body stripped of its integuments; a skeleton.

O that my tongue were in the thunder's mouth,
Then with a passion I would shake the world,
And rouze from sleep that fell anatomy,
Which cannot hear a feeble lady's voice. Shaksp.

5. By way of irony or ridicule, a thin, meagre person.

They brought one Pinch, a hungry lean faced villain,
A mere anatomy, a mountebank,
A thread-bare juggler, and a fortune-teller,
A needy hollow-eyed, sharp-looking wretch,
A living dead man. Shaksp. Comedy of Errours.

A'NATRON. n. s. The scum which swims upon the molten glass in the furnace, which, when taken off, melts in the air, and then coagulates into common salt. It is likewise that salt which gathers upon the walls of vaults.

A'NBURY.† n. s. See AMBURY. Anbury is also a disease in turnips. See Grose's Prov. Gloss. and Marshall's Rural Economy of Norfolk.

This, I have been informed, is the name of a black fly, that devours the tunips in their early state of vegetation. This fly lays its egg in the root of the turnip, and causes those warts or excrescences visible on the outside of it, in each of which may be found a small white worm, called also the anbury, which afterwards becomes that little black fly mentioned above.

A'NCESTOR.† n. s. [Lat. ancessor for antecessor; Fr. ancestre, referred by Cotgrave to antecessure, by others to ains, i. e. before, and être, to be; written formerly aunciters, Foxe's Pref. to Sax. Gosp. and auncieters, Stapleton's Fort. of the Faith, 1565.] One from whom a person descends, either by the father or the mother. It is distinguished from predecessor: which is not, like ancestor, a natural, but civil denomination. An hereditary monarch succeeds to his ancestors; an elective, to his predecessors.

And she lies buried with her ancestors,
O, in a tomb where never scandal slept,
Save this of hers. Shaksp. Much Ado about Nothing.

Cham was the paternal ancestor of Ninus, the father of Chus, the grandfather of Nimrod; whose son was Belus, the father of Ninus. Ralegh.

Obscure! why pr'ythee what am I? I know
My father, grandsire, and great grandsire too:
If farther I derive my pedigree,
I can but guess beyond the fourth degree,
The rest of my forgotten ancestors,
Were sons of earth like him, or sons of whores.
Dryden.

A'NCESTRAL.* adj. [from ancestor.] Resembling ancestors.

History is the great looking-glass, through which we may behold with ancestral eyes, not only the various actions of ages past, and the odd accidents that attend time; but also discern the different humours of men, and feel the pulse of former times. Howell's Lett., iv. 11.

A'NCESTREL.† adj. [from ancestor.] Claimed from ancestors; relating to ancestors: a term of law. Johnson elsewhere writes it ancestral.

Limitation in actions ancestrel, was anciently so here in England. Hale.

He soon afterwards solicited the office of sheriff, from which all his neighbours were glad to be reprieved, but which he regarded as a resumption of ancestral claims, and a kind of restoration to blood after the attainder of a trade.

A'NCHENTRY. n. s. [from ancient, and therefore properly to be written ancientry.] Antiquity of a family; ancient dignity; appearance or proof of antiquity.

Wooing, wedding, and repenting, is a Scotch jig, a measure and a cinque pace; the first suit is hot and hasty, like a Scotch jig, and full as fantastical; the wedding mannerly modest, as a measure full of state and anchentry; and then comes repentance, and with his bad legs falls into the cinque pace faster and faster, till he sinks into his grave. Shakspeare.

A'NCHOR.† n. s. [anchora, Lat. ancep, ancop, Sax. ankar, Su.-Goth., ancker, Teut.]

1. A heavy iron, composed of a long shank, having a ring at one end, to which the cable is fastened, and at the other, branching out into two arms or flooks, tending upwards, with barbs or edges on each side. Its use is to hold the ship, by being fixed to the ground.

The winds, and reach'd at length the Cuman shore:

2. It is used, by a metaphor, for any thing which confers stability or security.

Witness that breast,
Which in thy bosom anchor'd his whole rest. Bp. Henry King's Poems.

A'NCHOR.† n. s. [Dr. Johnsons says, that Shakspeare seems to have used this word for anchoret, or an abstemious recluse person. And Mr. Steevens observes, that this abbreviation [he might have said established usage] of the word anchoret is very antient. No one will doubt this, when I add, that the Saxon word ancep is anchoreta, solitarius, an hermit, a recluse. Barret, in his old dictionary, writes it ancher; and Chaucer, ankir. Rom. R. 6348.]

A'NCHOR-HOLD. n. s. [from anchor and hold.] The hold or fastness of the anchor, and, figuratively, security.

The old English could express most aptly all the conceits of the mind in their own tongue, without borrowing from any; as for example: the holy service of God, which the Latins called religion, because it knitted the minds of men together, and most people of Europe have borrowed the same from them, they called most significantly eanfastness, as the one and only assurance and fast anchor-hold of our souls health. Camden.

A'NCHOR-SMITH. n. s. [from anchor and smith.] The maker or forger of anchors.

ANCHO'VY.† n. s. [from anchova, Span. or anchioe, Ital. of the same signification. Formerly written anchove.] A little sea-fish, much used by way of sauce or seasoning. Scaliger describes the anchovy as of the herring kind, about the length of a finger, having a pointed snout, a wide mouth, no teeth, but gums as rough as a saw. Others make it a sort of sardine, or pilchard; but others, with better reason, hold it a peculiar species, very different from either. The fishing is chiefly in the night-time; when a light being put on the stern of their little fishing vessels, the anchovies flock round, and are caught in nets. Savary.

A'NCIENT. adj. [ancien, Fr. antiquus, Lat.]

1. Old; that happened long since; of old time; not modern. Ancient and old are distinguished; old relates to the duration of the thing itself, as, an old coat, a coat much worn; and ancient, to time in general, as, an ancient dress, a habit used in former times. But this is not always observed; for we mention old customs; but though old be sometimes opposed to modern, ancient is seldom opposed to new but when new means modern.

Ancient tenure is that whereby all the manours belonging to the crown, in St. Edward's or William the Conquerour's days, did hold. The number and names of which manours, as all others belonging to common persons, he caused to be written in a book, after a survey made of them, now remaining in the exchequer, and called doomsday book; and such as by that book appeared to have belonged to the crown at that time, are called ancient demesnes. Cowel.

A'NCIENT.† n. s. [This word is also written anshent, and heraldick writers call the guidon used at funerals an anshent. Cowel supposes the word to have been corrupted by sailors from end-sheet. See Cowel's Interpreter in V. ANCIENT.]

More dishonourable ragged than an old faced ancient. Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

Bale, Yet a Course at the Romyshe Foxe, fol. 19.

A'NCIENTRY.† n. s. [from ancient.]

1. The honour of ancient lineage; the dignity of birth.

AND.† conjunction. [Sax. anð, from anab, the imperative of the Sax. anan-aþ, to add to or make an heap; according to Mr. Tooke. Dr. Jamieson prefers the Icelandick end, and the Su-Goth. aen, both meaning and as well as if; which indeed may more probably be the parent than the compound word anan-aþ.]

1. The particle by which sentences or terms are joined, which it is not easy to explain by any synonimous word.

Nay, and I suffer this, I may go graze.
Beaum. and Fl. Woman's Prize, i. 3.

3. In and if, the and is redundant and is omitted by all later writers, Dr. Johnson says; and Mr. Tooke approves it. The usage of it is found in our established version of the New Testament.

See Roquefort, Gloss. de la Langue Rom. ANGELOT, ANGELET.]

3. A cheese so called. Cotgrave.

Skinner mentions this cheese to have been brought from Normandy, and supposes it to have been so called from some person of the name of Angelot, who first made or brought it into vogue. Some of the animated substances have various organical or instrumental parts, fitted for a variety of motions from place to place, and a spring of life within themselves, as beasts, birds, fishes, and insects; these are called animals. But justice, and some fatal curse annex'd,
Deprives them of their outward liberty. Milton.

1. A yearly rent to be paid for term of life or years. The differences between a rent and an annuity are, that every rent is going out of land; but an annuity charges only the granter, or his heirs, that have assets by descent. The second difference is, that, for the recovery of an annuity, no action lies, but only the writ of annuity against the granter, his heirs, or successors; but of a rent, the same actions lie as do of land. The third difference is, that an annuity is never taken for assets, because it is no freehold in law; nor shall be put in execution upon a statute merchant, statute staple, or elegit, as a rent may. Cowel.

A'NTIMONY.† n. s. [The stibium of the ancients, by the Greeks called στιμμι. The reason of its modern denomination is referred to Basil Valentine, a German monk; who, as the tradition relates, having thrown some of it to the hogs, observed, that, after it had purged them heartily, they immediately fattened; and therefore, he imagined, his fellow monks would be the better for a like dose. The experiment, however, succeeded so ill, that they all died of it; and the medicine was thenceforward called antimoine; antimonk. This etymology, given by Dr. Johnson, is what Furetière relates; and is of a romantick rather than a serious cast. From being found in the mines of all metals, it is probable that its denomination may have arisen from ἀντὶ and μονος, i. e. not confined to one thing, in opposition to one. See Morin, Dict. Etym. Fr. et Gr. One of our old dictionaries cites Arab. atimad.]

Antimony is a mineral substance, of a metalline nature, having all the seeming characters of a real metal, except malleability; and may be called a semimetal, being a fossile glebe of some undetermined metal, combined with a sulphurous and stony substance. Mines of all metals afford it; that in gold mines is reckoned best. It has also its own mines in Hungary, Germany, and France. Its texture is full of little shining veins or threads, like needles; brittle as glass. Sometimes veins of a red or golden colour are intermixed, which is called male antimony; that without them being denominated female antimony. It fuses in the fire, though with some difficulty; and dissolves more easily in water. It destroys and dissipates all metals fused with it, except gold; and is therefore useful in refining. It is a common ingredient in speculums, or burning concaves; serving to give them a finer polish. It makes a part in bell metal; and renders the sound more clear. It is mingled with tin to make it more hard, white, and sound; and with lead in the casting of printers' letters, to render them more smooth and firm. It is a general help in the melting of metals, and especially in casting of cannon balls. In pharmacy, it is used under various forms, and with various intentions, chiefly as an emetick. Chambers.

Antimony is of a greyish white colour, and moderately brilliant; when combined with sulphur in the earth, it forms an ore of antimony commonly called crude antimony. Parkinson.

APO'LOGY.† n. s. [apologia, Lat ἀπολογία.]

Came prologue, and apology to prompt;
Which with bland words at will she thus address'd.

He bears into the bath; whence want of breath,
Repletions, apoplex, intestate death.
